

no. 12
1.

4-0-0

C/W

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2025

<https://archive.org/details/oldsaintpaulsorp00ains>

OLD SAINT PAUL'S;

OR,

THE PLAGUE AND FIRE OF LONDON.

BY WILLIAM HARRISON AINSWORTH.

LONDON :

Printed for Private Circulation only.

1842.

OLD SAINT PAUL'S.

BOOK THE FIRST.

CHAPTER I.

THE GROCER OF WOOD-STREET AND HIS FAMILY.

ONE night, at the latter end of April, 1665, the family of a citizen of London, carrying on an extensive business as a grocer in Wood-street, Cheapside, were assembled, according to custom, at prayer. The grocer's name was Stephen Bloundel. His family consisted of his wife, three sons, and two daughters. He had, moreover, an apprentice; an elderly female serving as cook; her son, a young man about five-and-twenty, filling the place of porter to the shop and general assistant; and a kitchen-maid. The whole household attended;—for the worthy grocer being a strict observer of his religious duties, as well as a rigid disciplinarian in other respects, suffered no one to be absent, on any plea whatever (except indisposition), from morning and evening devotions; and these were always performed at stated times. In fact, the establishment was conducted with the regularity of clock-work; it being the aim of its master not to pass a single hour of the day unprofitably.

The ordinary prayers gone through, Stephen Bloundel offered up a long and fervent supplication to the Most High for protection against the devouring pestilence with which the city was then scourged. He acknowledged that this terrible visitation had been justly brought upon it by the wickedness of its inhabitants; that they deserved their doom, dreadful though it was; that, like the dwellers in Jerusalem before it was given up to ruin and desolation, they “had mocked the messengers of God and despised his word;” that, in the language of the prophet, “they had refused to hearken, and pulled away the shoulder, and stopped their ears that they should not hear; yea, had made their heart like an adamant stone, lest they should hear the law and the words which the Lord of Hosts had sent in his spirit by the former prophets.” He admitted that great sins require great chastisement, and that the sins of London were enormous; that it was filled with strifes, seditions, heresies, murders, drunkenness, revellings, and every kind of abomination; that the ordinances of God were neglected, and all manner of vice openly practised; that, despite repeated warnings, and afflictions less grievous than the present, these vicious practices had been persisted in. All this he humbly acknowledged. But he implored a gracious Providence, in consideration of his few faithful servants, to spare the others yet a little longer, and give them a last chance of repentance and amendment. Or, if this could not be, and their utter extirpation was inevitable, that the habitations of the devout might be exempted from the general destruction—might be places of refuge, as Zoar was to Lot. He concluded by earnestly exhorting those around him to keep constant watch upon themselves; not to murmur at God's dealings and dispensations; but so to comport themselves, that “they might be able to stand in the day of wrath, in the day of death, and in the day of judgment.” The exhortation produced a powerful effect upon its hearers, and they arose,—some with serious, others with terrified looks.

And here, before proceeding further, it may be desirable to show in what manner the dreadful pestilence referred to by the grocer commenced, and how far its ravages had already extended. Two years before, namely,—in 1663,—more than a third of the population of Amsterdam was carried off by a desolating plague. Hamburg was also grievously afflicted about the same time, and in the same manner. Notwithstanding every effort to cut off communication with these states, the insidious disease found its way into England by means of some bales of merchandize, as it was suspected, at the latter end of the year 1664, when two persons died suddenly, with undoubted symptoms of the distemper, in Westminster. Its next appearance was at a house in Long-acre, and its victims two Frenchmen, who had brought goods from the Levant. Smothered for a short time, like a fire upon which coals had been heaped, it broke out with fresh fury in several places.

And now the consternation began. The whole city was panic-stricken. Nothing was talked of but the plague—nothing planned but means of arresting its progress. One grim and ghastly idea possessed the minds of all. Like a hideous phantom stalking the streets at noon-day, and scaring all in its path, Death took his course through London, and selected his prey at pleasure. The general alarm was further increased by the predictions confidently made as to the vast numbers who would be swept away by the visitation; by the prognostications of astrologers; by the prophesyings of enthusiasts; by the denunciations of preachers; and by the portents and prodigies reported to have occurred. During the long and frosty winter preceding this fatal year, a comet appeared in the heavens, the sickly colour of which was supposed to forebode the judgment about to follow. Blazing stars, and other meteors of a lurid hue and strange and preternatural shape, were likewise seen. The sun was said to have set in streams of blood, and the moon to have shone without reflecting a shadow; grisly shapes appeared at night; strange clamours and groans were heard in the air; hearses, coffins, and heaps of unburied dead, were discovered in the sky; and great cakes and clots of blood were found in the Tower-moat; while a marvellous double tide occurred at London-bridge. All these prodigies were currently reported, and in most cases believed.

The severe frost, before noticed, did not break up till the end of February, and with the thaw the plague frightfully increased in violence. From Drury-lane, it spread along Holborn, eastward as far as the Great Turnstile, and westward to Saint Giles's Pound, and so along the Tyburn-road. Saint Andrew's Holborn was next infected; and as this was a much more populous parish than the former, the deaths were more numerous within it. For some time, the disease was checked by Fleet Ditch; it then leaped this narrow boundary, and ascending the opposite hill, carried fearful devastation into the parish of Saint James, Clerkenwell. At the same time, it attacked Saint Bride's; thinned the ranks of the thievish horde haunting Whitefriars; and proceeding in an easterly course, decimated Saint Clement Danes.

Hitherto, the city had escaped. The destroyer had not passed Ludgate or Newgate, but environed the walls like a besieging enemy. A few days, however, before the opening of this history, fine weather having commenced, the horrible disease began to grow more rife, and, laughing all precautions and impediments to scorn, broke out in the very heart of the stronghold—namely, in Bearbinder-lane, near Stocks market, where nine persons died.

At a season so awful, it may be imagined how an impressive address, like that delivered by the grocer, would be received by those who saw in the pestilence not merely an overwhelming scourge from which few could escape, but a direct manifestation of the Divine displeasure. Not a word was said. Blaize Shotterel, the porter, and old Josyna, his mother, together with Patience, the other woman-servant, betook themselves silently, and with troubled countenances, to the kitchen. Leonard Holt, the apprentice, lingered for a moment to catch a glance from the soft blue eyes of Amabel, the grocer's eldest daughter (for even the plague was a secondary consideration with him when she was present), and failing in the attempt, he heaved a deep sigh, which was luckily laid to the account of the discourse he had just listened to by his sharp-sighted master, and proceeded to the shop, where he busied himself in arranging matters for the night.

Having just completed his twenty-first year, and his apprenticeship being within a few months of its expiration, Leonard Holt began to think of returning to his native town of Manchester, where he intended to settle, and where he had once fondly hoped the fair Amabel would accompany him, in the character of his bride. Not that he had ever ventured to declare his passion, nor that he had received sufficient encouragement to make it matter of certainty that if he did so declare himself, he should be accepted; but being both "proper and tall," and having tolerable confidence in his good looks, he had made himself, up to a short time prior to his introduction to the reader, quite easy on the point.

His present misgivings were occasioned by Amabel's altered manner towards him, and by a rival, who, he had reason to fear, had completely superseded him in her good graces. Brought up together from an early age, the grocer's daughter and the young apprentice had, at first, regarded each other as brother and sister. By degrees, the feeling changed. Amabel became more reserved, and held little intercourse with Leonard, who, busied with his own concerns, thought little about her. But as he grew towards manhood, he could not remain insensible to her extraordinary beauty—for extraordinary it was, and such as to attract admiration wherever she went, so that "the Grocer's Daughter" became the toast among the ruffling gallants of the town, many of whom sought to obtain speech with her. Her parents, however, were far too careful of her to permit any such approach. Amabel's stature was lofty; her limbs slight, but exquisitely symmetrical; her features small, and cast in the most delicate mould; her eyes of the softest blue; and her hair luxuriant, and of the finest texture and richest brown. Her other beauties must be left to the imagination, but it must not be omitted that she was barely eighteen, and had all the freshness, the innocence, and vivacity of that most charming period of woman's existence. No wonder she ravished every heart. No wonder in an age when love-making was more general even than now, that she was beset by admirers. No wonder her father's apprentice became desperately enamoured of her, and proportionately jealous.

And this brings us to his rival. On the 10th of April, two gallants, both richly attired, and both young and handsome, dismounted before the grocer's door, and, leaving their steeds to the care of their attendants, entered the shop. They made sundry purchases of preserves, figs, and other dried fruit, chatted familiarly with the grocer, and tarried so long that at last he began to suspect they must have some motive. All at once, however, they disagreed on some slight matter,—Bloundel could not tell what, nor, perhaps, could the disputants, even if their quarrel was not preconcerted—high words arose, and in another moment swords were drawn, and furious passes exchanged. The grocer called to his eldest son,—a stout youth of nineteen,—and to Leonard Holt to separate them. The apprentice seized his cudgel—no apprentice in those days was without one,—and rushed towards the combatants, but before he could reach them, the fray was ended. One of them had received a thrust through the sword arm, and his blade dropping, his antagonist declared himself satisfied, and with a grave salute walked off. The wounded man wrapped a laced handkerchief round his arm, but immediately afterwards complained of great faintness. Pitying his condition, and suspecting no harm, the grocer led him into the inner room, where restoratives were offered him by Mrs. Bloundel and her daughter Amabel, both of whom had been alarmed by the noise of the conflict. In a short time, the wounded man was so far recovered as to be able to converse with his assistants, especially the younger one; and the grocer having returned to the shop, his discourse became so very animated and tender that Mrs. Bloundel deemed it prudent to give her daughter a hint to retire. Amabel reluctantly obeyed, for the young stranger was so handsome, so richly dressed, had such a captivating manner, and so distinguished an air, that she was strongly prepossessed in his favour. A second look from her mother, however, caused her to disappear, nor did she return. After waiting with suppressed anxiety for some time, the young gallant departed, overwhelming the good dame with his thanks, and entreating permission to call again. This, however, was peremptorily refused, but notwithstanding the interdiction, he came on the following day. The grocer chanced to be out at the time, and the gallant, who had probably watched him go forth, deriding the remonstrances of the younger Bloundel and Leonard, marched straight to the inner room, where he found the dame and her daughter. They were much disconcerted at his appearance, and the latter instantly arose with the intention of retiring, but the gallant caught her arm and detained her.

"Do not fly me, Amabel," he cried, in an impassioned tone, "but suffer me to declare the love I have for you. I cannot live without you."

Amabel, whose neck and cheeks were crimsoned with blushes, cast down her eyes before the ardent regards of the gallant, and endeavoured to withdraw her hand.

"One word only," he continued, "and I release you. Am I wholly indifferent to you? Answer me,—yes, or no?"

"Do not answer him, Amabel," interposed her mother. "He is deceiving you. He loves you not. He would ruin you. This is the way with all these court butterflies. Tell him you hate him, child, and bid him begone."

"But I cannot tell him an untruth, mother," returned Amabel, artlessly, "for I do not hate him."

"Then you love me," cried the young man, falling on his knees, and pressing her hand to his lips. "Tell me so, and make me the happiest of men."

But Amabel had now recovered from the confusion into which she had been thrown, and, alarmed at her own indiscretion, forcibly withdrew her hand, exclaiming in a cold tone, and with much natural dignity, "Arise, sir. I will not tolerate these freedoms. My mother is right, you have some ill design."

"By my soul, no!" cried the gallant passionately. "I love you, and would make you mine."

"No doubt," remarked Mrs. Bloundel, contemptuously, "but not by marriage."

"Yes, by marriage," rejoined the gallant, rising. "If she will consent, I will wed her forthwith."

Both Amabel and her mother looked surprised at the young man's declaration, which was uttered with a fervour that seemed to leave no doubt of its sincerity; but the latter, fearing some artifice, replied, "If what you say is true, and you really love my daughter as much as you pretend, this is not the way to win her, for though she can make no pretensions to wed with one of your seeming degree—nor is it for her happiness that she should—yet were she sought by the proudest noble in the land, she shall never, if I can help it, be lightly won. If your intentions are honourable, you must address yourself in the first place to her father, and if he agrees (which I much doubt) that you shall become her suitor, I can make no objection. Till this is settled, I must pray you to desist from further importunity."

"And so must I," added Amabel. "I cannot give you a hope till you have spoken to my father."

"Be it so," replied the gallant, "I will tarry here till his return."

So saying, he was about to seat himself, but Mrs. Bloundel prevented him.

"I cannot permit this, sir," she cried. "Your tarrying here may, for aught I know, bring scandal upon my house—I am sure it will be disagreeable to my husband. I am unacquainted with your name and condition. You may be a man of rank. You may be one of the profligate and profane crew who haunt the court. You may be the worst of them all, my Lord Rochester himself, for they say when he is about his devilish designs he can put on the garb of angel innocence. But whoever you are, and whatever your rank and station may be, unless your character will bear the strictest scrutiny, I am certain Stephen Bloundel will never consent to your union with his daughter."

"Nay, mother," observed Amabel, "you judge the gentleman unjustly. I am sure he is neither a profligate gallant himself, nor a companion of such—especially of the Earl of Rochester."

"I pretend to be no better than I am," replied the young man, repressing a smile which rose to his lips at Mrs. Bloundel's address. "But I shall reform when I am married. It would be impossible to be inconstant to so fair a creature as Amabel. For my rank I have none. My condition is that of a private gentleman—my name, Maurice Wyvil."

"What you say of yourself, Mr. Maurice Wyvil, convinces me you will meet with a decided refusal from my husband," returned Mrs. Bloundel.

"I trust not," replied Wyvil, glancing tenderly at Amabel. "If I should be so fortunate as to gain his consent, have I yours?"

"It is too soon to ask that question," she rejoined, blushing deeply. "And now, sir, you must go—indeed you must. You distress my mother."

"If I do not distress you, I will stay," resumed Wyvil, with an imploring look.

"You do distress me," she answered, averting her gaze.

"Nay, then, I must tear myself away," he rejoined. "I shall return shortly, and trust to find your father less flinty-hearted than he is represented."

He would have clasped Amabel in his arms, and perhaps snatched a kiss, if her mother had not rushed between them. "No more familiarities, sir," she cried, angrily—"no court manners here. If you look to wed my daughter, you must conduct yourself more decorously. But I can tell you you have no chance—none whatever."

"Time will show," replied Wyvil, audaciously. "You had better give her to me quietly, and save me the trouble of carrying her off,—for have her I will."

"Mercy on us!" cried Mrs. Bloundel, in accents of alarm, "now his wicked intentions are out."

"Fear nothing, mother," observed Amabel, coldly. "He will scarcely carry me off without my own consent, and I am not likely to sacrifice myself for one who holds me in such light esteem."

"Forgive me, Amabel," said Wyvil, in a voice so penitent that it instantly effaced her displeasure, "I meant not to offend you. I spoke only the language of distraction. Do not dismiss me thus, or my death will lie at your door."

"I should be sorry for that," she replied, "but, inexperienced as I am, I feel this is not the language of real regard, but of furious passion. We must not meet again."

A dark shade passed over Wyvil's handsome features, and the almost feminine beauty by which they were characterised gave place to a fierce and forbidding expression. Controlling himself by a powerful effort, he replied, with forced calmness, "Amabel, you know not what it is to love. I will not stir hence till I have seen your father."

"We will see that, sir," exclaimed Mrs. Bloundel, angrily. "What ho! son Stephen! Leonard Holt! I say. This gentleman will stay here whether I like or not. Show him forth."

"That I will, right willingly," replied the apprentice, rushing before the younger Bloundel, and flourishing his formidable cudgel. "Out with you, sir! Out with you!"

"Not at your bidding, you saucy knave," rejoined Wyvil, laying his hand upon his sword. "And if it were not for the presence of your mistress and her lovely daughter, I would crop your ears for your insolence."

"Their presence shall not prevent me from making my cudgel and your shoulders acquainted, if you do not budge," replied the apprentice, sturdily.

Infuriated by the retort, Wyvil would have drawn his sword, but a blow on the arm disabled him.

"Plague on you, fellow!" he exclaimed. "You shall rue this to the last day of your existence."

"Threaten those who heed you," replied Leonard, about to repeat the blow.

"Do him no further injury!" cried Amabel, arresting his hand, and looking with the greatest commiseration at Wyvil. "You have dealt with him far too rudely already."

"Since I have your sympathy, sweet Amabel," rejoined Wyvil, "I care not what rude treatment I experience from this churl. We shall soon meet again." And bowing to her, he strode out of the room.

Leonard followed him to the shop-door, hoping some further pretext for quarrel would arise, but he was disappointed. Wyvil took no notice of him, and proceeded at a slow pace towards Cheapside.

Half an hour afterwards, Stephen Bloundel came home. On being informed of what had occurred he was greatly annoyed, though he tried to conceal his vexation, and highly applauded his daughter's conduct. Without further comment, he proceeded about his business, and remained in the shop till it was closed. Wyvil did not return, and the grocer tried to persuade himself they should see nothing more of him. Before Amabel retired to rest, he imprinted a kiss on her snowy brow, and said in a tone of the utmost kindness, "You have never yet deceived me, child, and I hope never will. Tell me truly, do you take any interest in this young gallant?"

Amabel blushed deeply.

"I should not speak the truth, father," she rejoined, after a pause, "if I were to say I do not."

"I am sorry for it," replied Bloundel, gravely. "But you would not be happy with him. I am sure he is unprincipled and profligate. You must forget him."

"I will try to do so," sighed Amabel. And the conversation dropped.

On the following day, Maurice Wyvil entered the grocer's shop. He was more richly attired than before, and there was a haughtiness in his manner which he had not hitherto assumed. What passed between him and Bloundel was not known, for the latter never spoke of it, but the result may be gathered from the fact that the young gallant was not allowed an interview with his daughter.

From this moment, the change, previously noticed, took place in Amabel's demeanour towards Leonard. She seemed scarcely able to endure his presence, and sedulously avoided his regards. From being habitually gay and cheerful, she became pensive and reserved. Her mother more than once caught her in tears, and it was evident, from many other signs, that Wyvil completely engrossed her thoughts. Fully aware of this, Mrs. Bloundel said nothing of it to her husband, because the subject was painful to him, and not supposing the passion deeply rooted, she hoped it would speedily wear away. But she was mistaken. The flame was kept alive in Amabel's breast in a manner of which she was totally ignorant. Wyvil found means to deceive the vigilance of the grocer and his wife, but he could not deceive the vigilance of a jealous lover. Leonard discovered that his mistress had received a letter. He would not betray her, but he determined to watch her narrowly. Accordingly, when she went forth one morning in company with her younger sister (a little girl of some five years old), he made an excuse to follow them, and, keeping within sight, perceived them enter Saint Paul's Cathedral, the mid aisle of which was then converted into a public walk, and generally thronged with town gallants, bullies, bona-robas, cut-purses, and rogues of every description. In short, it was the haunt of the worst characters of the metropolis. When, therefore, Amabel entered this structure, Leonard felt certain it was to meet her lover. Rushing forward, he saw her take her course through the crowd, and attract general attention from her loveliness—but he nowhere discerned Maurice Wyvil.

Suddenly, however, she struck off to the right, and halted near one of the pillars, and the apprentice, advancing, detected his rival behind it. He was whispering a few words in her ear, unperceived by her sister. Maddened by the sight, Leonard hurried towards them, but before he could reach the spot Wyvil was gone, and Amabel, though greatly confused, looked at the same time so indignant that he almost regretted his precipitation.

"You will, of course, make known to my father what you have just seen?" she said, in a low tone.

"If you will promise not to see that youth again without my knowledge, I will not," replied Leonard.

After a moment's reflection, Amabel gave the required promise, and they returned to Wood-street together. Satisfied she would not break her word, the apprentice became more easy, and as a week elapsed and nothing was said to him on the subject, he persuaded himself she would not attempt to meet her lover again.

Things were in this state at the opening of our Tale, but upon the night in question, Leonard fancied he discerned some agitation in Amabel's manner towards him, and in consequence of this notion, he sought to meet her gaze, as before related, after prayers. While trying to distract his thoughts by arranging sundry firkins of butter, and putting other things in order, he heard a light footstep behind him, and turning at the sound, beheld Amabel.

"Leonard," she whispered, "I promised to tell you when I should next meet Maurice Wyvil. He will be here to-night." And without giving him time to answer, she retired.

For a few minutes, Leonard remained in a state almost of stupefaction, repeating to himself, as if unwilling to believe them, the words he had just heard. He had not recovered, when the grocer entered the shop, and noticing his haggard looks, kindly inquired if he felt unwell. The apprentice returned an evasive answer, and half determined to relate all he knew to his master; but the next moment, he changed his intention, and, influenced by that chivalric feeling which always governs those, of whatever condition, who love profoundly, resolved not to betray the thoughtless girl, but to trust to his own ingenuity to thwart the designs of his rival, and preserve her. Acting upon this resolution, he said he had a slight headache, and instantly resumed his occupation.

At nine o'clock, the whole family assembled at supper. The board was plentifully though plainly spread, but the grocer observed with some uneasiness that his apprentice, who had a good appetite in ordinary, ate little or nothing. He kept his eye constantly upon him, and became convinced from his manner that something ailed him. Not having any notion of the truth, and being filled with apprehensions of the plague, his dread was that Leonard was infected by the disease. Supper was generally the pleasantest meal of the day at the grocer's house, but on this occasion it passed off cheerlessly enough, and a circumstance occurred at its close which threw all into confusion and distress. Before relating this, however, we must complete our description of the family under their present aspect.

Tall, and of a spare frame, with good features, somewhat austere in their expression, and of the cast which we are apt to term precise and puritanical, but tempered with great benevolence, Stephen Bloundel had a keen deep-seated eye, overshadowed by thick brows, and suffered his long-flowing grey hair to descend over his shoulders. His forehead was high and ample, his chin square and well defined, and his general appearance exceedingly striking. In age he was about fifty. His integrity and fairness of dealing, never once called in question for a period of thirty years, had won him the esteem of all who knew him; while his prudence and economy had enabled him during that time to amass a tolerable fortune. His methodical habits and strong religious principles have been already mentioned. His eldest son was named after him, and resembled him both in person and character, promising (alas! it was never realized) to tread in his foot-steps. The younger sons require little notice at present. One was twelve, and the other only half that age: but both appeared to inherit much of their father's good qualities. Basil, the elder, was a stout, well-grown lad, and had never known a day's ill health; while Hubert, the younger, was thin and delicate, and constantly ailing.

Mrs. Bloundel was a specimen of a city dame of the best kind. She had a few pardonable vanities which no arguments could overcome—such as a little ostentation in her dress—a little pride in the neatness of her house—and a good deal in the beauty of her children, especially in that of Amabel,—as well as in the wealth and high character of her husband, whom she regarded as the most perfect of human beings. These slight failings allowed for, nothing but good remained. Her conduct was exemplary in all the relations of life. The tenderest of mothers, and the most affectionate of wives, she had as much genuine piety and strictness of moral principles as her husband. Short, plump, and well-proportioned,—though somewhat, perhaps, exceeding the rules of symmetry,—she had a rich olive complexion, fine black eyes beaming with good nature, and an ever-laughing mouth, ornamented by a beautiful set of teeth. To wind up all, she was a few years younger than her husband.

Amabel has already been described. The youngest girl, Christiana, was a pretty little, dove-eyed, flaxen haired child, between four and five years old, and shared the fate of most younger children, being very much caressed, and not a little spoiled by her parents.

The foregoing description of the grocer's family would be incomplete without some mention of his household. Old Josyna Shotterel, the cook, who had lived with her master ever since his marriage, and had the strongest attachment for him, was a hale, stout dame, of about sixty, with few infirmities for her years, and with less asperity of temper than generally belongs to servants of her class. She was a native of Holland, and came to England early in life, where she married Blaize's father, who died soon after their union. An excellent cook in a plain way—indeed, she had no practice in any other—she would brew strong ale and mead, or mix a sack-posset, with any innkeeper in the city. Moreover, she was a careful and tender nurse, if her services were ever required in that capacity. The children looked upon her as a second mother, and her affection for them, which was unbounded, deserved their regard. She was a perfect storehouse of what are termed "old women's receipts," and there were few complaints (except the plague) for which she did not think herself qualified to prescribe, and able to cure. Her skill in the healing art was often tested by her charitable mistress, who required her to prepare remedies, as well as nourishing broths, for such of the poor of the parish as applied to her for relief at times of sickness.

Her son, Blaize, was a stout, stumpy fellow, about four feet ten, with a head somewhat too large for his body, and extremely long arms. Ever since the plague had broken out in Drury-lane, it had haunted him like a spectre, and scattered the few faculties he possessed. In vain he tried to combat his alarm—in vain his mother endeavoured to laugh him out of it. Nothing would do. He read the bills of mortality daily; ascertained the particulars of every case; dilated upon the agonies of the sufferers; watched the progress of the infection; and calculated the time it would take to reach Wood-street. He talked of the pestilence by day, and dreamed of it at night; and more than once alarmed the house by roaring for assistance, under the idea that he was suddenly attacked. By his mother's advice, he steeped rue, wormwood, and sage in his drink, till it was so abominably nauseous that he could scarcely swallow it, and carried a small ball in the hollow of his hand, compounded of wax, angelica, camphor, and other drugs. He, likewise, chewed a small piece of Virginian snake-root, or zedoary, if he approached any place that he supposed infected. A dried toad was suspended round his neck, as an amulet of sovereign virtue. Every new nostrum sold by the quacks in the streets tempted him, and a few days before, he had expended his last crown in the purchase of a bottle of plague-water. Being of a superstitious nature, he placed full faith in all the predictions of the astrologers, who foretold that London should be utterly laid waste, that grass should grow in the streets, and that the living should not be able to bury the dead. He quaked at the terrible denunciations of the preachers, who exhorted their hearers to repentance, telling them a judgment was at hand, and shuddered at the wild and fearful prophesyings of the insane enthusiasts who roamed the streets. His nativity having been cast, and it appearing that he would be in great danger on the 20th of June, he made up his mind that he should die of the plague on that day. Before he was assailed by these terrors, he had entertained a sneaking attachment for Patience, the kitchen-maid, a young and buxom damsel, who had no especial objection to him; but of late, his love had given way to apprehension, and his whole thoughts were centered in one idea, namely, self-preservation.

By this time, supper was over, and the family were about to separate for the night, when Stephen, the grocer's eldest son, having risen to quit the room, staggered, and complained of a strange dizziness and headache, which almost deprived him of sight, while his heart palpitated frightfully. A dreadful suspicion seized his father. He ran towards him, and assisted him to a seat. Scarcely had the young man reached it, when a violent sickness seized him; a greenish-coloured froth appeared at the mouth, and he began to grow delirious. Guided by the convulsive efforts of the sufferer, Bloundel tore off his clothes, and, after a moment's search, perceived under the left arm a livid pustule. He uttered a cry of anguish. His son was plague-stricken.

CHAPTER II.

THE COFFIN-MAKER.

THE first shock over, the grocer bore the affliction manfully, and like one prepared for it. Exhibiting little outward emotion, though his heart was torn with anguish, and acting with the utmost calmness, he forbade his wife to approach the sufferer, and desired her instantly to retire to her own room with her daughters; and not to leave it on any consideration whatever, without his permission. Accustomed to regard her husband's word as law, Mrs. Bloundel, for the first time in her life, disputed his authority, and, falling on her knees, besought him, with tears in her eyes, to allow her to nurse her son. But he remained inflexible, and she was forced to comply. He next gave similar directions to old Josyna respecting his two younger sons, with this difference only,—that when she had put them to rest, and locked the door upon them, she was to return to the kitchen and prepare a posset-drink of canary and spirit of sulphur, together with a poultice of mallows, lily-roots, figs, linseed, and palm-oil, for the patient. These orders given and obeyed, with Leonard Holt's assistance,—for Blaize, who had crept into a corner, in extremity of terror, was wholly incapable of rendering any,—he conveyed his son to an adjoining room on the ground floor, where there was a bed, and placing him within it, heaped blankets upon him to promote profuse perspiration, while the apprentice lighted a fire.

Provided with the most efficacious remedies for the distemper, and acquainted with the mode of treating it prescribed by the College of Physicians, Bloundel was at no loss how to act, but, rubbing the part affected with a stimulating ointment, administered at the same time doses of mithridate, Venice-treacle, and other potent alexipharmics. He had soon the satisfaction of perceiving that his son became somewhat easier; and after swallowing the posset-drink prepared by old Josyna, who used all the expedition she could, a moisture broke out upon the youth's skin, and appeared to relieve him so much, that, but for the ghastly paleness of his countenance, and the muddy look of his eye, his father would have indulged a hope of his recovery.

Up to this time, the grocer had acted for himself, and felt confident he had acted rightly, but he now deemed it expedient to call in advice, and, accordingly, commissioned his apprentice to fetch Doctor Hodges, a physician, residing in Great Knightrider-street, Doctors'-commons, who had recently acquired considerable reputation for his skilful treatment of those attacked by the plague, and who (it may be incidentally mentioned) afterwards gave to the medical world a curious account of the ravages of the disorder, as well as of his own professional experiences during this terrible period. He likewise told him,—and he could not repress a sigh as he did so,—to give notice to the Examiner of Health (there were one or two such officers appointed to every parish at this awful season by the City authorities), that his house was infected.

While preparing to set out, Leonard again debated with himself whether he should acquaint his master with Maurice Wyvil's meditated visit. But conceiving it wholly impossible that Amabel could leave her mother's room, even if she were disposed to do so, he determined to let the affair take its course. On his way to the shop he entered a small room occupied by Blaize, and found him seated near a table, with his hands upon his knees, and his eyes fixed upon the ground, looking the very image of despair. The atmosphere, which smelt like that of an apothecary's shop, was so overpowering that Leonard could scarcely breathe. The table was covered with pill-boxes and phials, most of which were emptied, and a dim light was afforded by a candle with a most portentous crest of snuff.

"So you have been poisoning yourself, I perceive," said Leonard, approaching.

"Keep off!" cried the porter, springing suddenly to his feet. "Don't touch me, I say. Poisoning myself! I have taken three refusés, or pestilential pills; two spoonfuls of alexiteral water; the same quantity of compound anti-pestilential decoction; half as much of Sir Theodore Mayerne's electuary; and a large dose of orvietan. Do you call that poisoning myself? I call it taking proper precautions, and would recommend you to do the same. Besides this, I have sprinkled myself with vinegar, fumigated my clothes, and rubbed my nose, inside and out, till it smarted so intolerably I was obliged to desist, with balsam of sulphur."

"Well, well, if you don't escape the plague, it won't be your fault," returned Leonard, scarcely able to refrain from smiling. "But I have something to tell you before I go."

"What is the matter?" demanded Blaize, in alarm. "Where—where are you going?"

"To fetch the doctor," replied Leonard.

"Is Master Stephen worse?" rejoined the porter.

"On the contrary, I hope he is better," replied Leonard. "I shall be back directly, but as I have to give notice to the Examiner of Health that the house is infected, I may be detained a few minutes longer than I anticipate. Keep the street door locked;—I will fasten the yard-gate, and do not, for your life, let any one in, except Doctor Hodges, till I return. Do you hear?—do you understand what I say?"

"Yes, I hear plain enough," groaned Blaize. "You say that the house is infected, and that we shall all be locked up."

"Dolt!" exclaimed the apprentice, "I said no such thing." And he repeated his injunctions, but Blaize was too much terrified to comprehend them. At last, losing all patience, he cried in a menacing tone, "If you do not attend to me, I will cudgel you within an inch of your life, and you will find the thrashing harder to bear even than the plague itself. Rouse yourself, fool, and follow me."

Accompanied by the porter, he then hurried to the yard-gate, saw that it was bolted within-side, and returned to the shop, where having found his cap and cudgel, he directed Blaize to lock the door after him, cautioning him, for the third time, not to admit any one except the doctor. "If I find on my return that you have neglected my injunctions," he concluded, "as sure as I now stand before you, I'll break every bone in your body."

Blaize promised obedience, adding, in a supplicating tone, "Leonard, if I were you, I would not go to the Examiner of Health. Poor Stephen may not have the plague after all. It's a dreadful thing to be imprisoned for a month,—for that's the time appointed by the Lord Mayor. Only a week ago, I passed several houses in Holborn, shut up on account of the plague, with a watchman at the door, and I never shall forget the faces I saw at the windows. It was a dreadful spectacle, and has haunted me ever since."

"It cannot be helped," rejoined Leonard, with a sigh. "If we disobey the Lord Mayor's orders, and neglect giving information, we shall all be sent to Newgate, while poor Stephen will be taken to the pest-house. Besides, the searchers will be here before morning. They are sure to learn what has happened from Doctor Hodges."

"True, true," replied Blaize, "I had forgotten that. Let me go with you, dear Leonard. I dare not remain here longer."

"What! would you leave your kind, good master, at a time like this, when he most needs your services!" rejoined Leonard, reproachfully. "Out, cowardly hound! I am ashamed of you. Shake off your fears, and be a man. You can but die once, and what matters it whether you die of the plague or the cholic?"

"It matters a great deal," replied Blaize. "I am afraid of nothing but the plague. I am sure I shall be its next victim in this house. But you are right, I cannot desert my kind master, nor my old mother. Farewell, Leonard. Perhaps, we may never meet again. I may be dead before you come back. I feel very ill already."

"No wonder, after all the stuff you have swallowed," returned Leonard. "But pluck up your courage, or you will bring on the very thing you are anxious to avoid. As many have died from fear as from any other cause. One word before I go. If any one should get into the house by scaling the yard-wall, or through the window, instantly alarm our master."

"Certainly," returned Blaize, with a look of surprise. "But do you expect any one to enter the house in that way?"

"Ask no questions, but do as I bid you," rejoined Leonard, opening the door, and about to go forth.

"Stop a moment," cried Blaize, detaining him, and drawing from his pocket a handful of simples. "Won't you take some of these with you to guard against infection? There's wormwood, woodsorrel, masterwort, zedoary, and angelica; and lastly, there's a little bottle of the sovereign preservative against the plague, as prepared by the great Lord Bacon, and approved by Queen Elizabeth. Won't you take that?"

"I have no fear," replied Leonard, shutting the door in his face. And as he lingered for a moment while it was locked, he heard Blaize say to himself, "I must go and take three more rufuses, and a large dose of diascordium."

It was a bright moonlight night, and as the apprentice turned to depart, he perceived a figure hastily retreating on the other side of the way. Satisfied it was Maurice Wyvil, though he could not distinguish the garb of the person,—that side of the street being in shade,—and stung by jealousy, he immediately started in pursuit. The fugitive struck down Lad-lane, and ran on till he came to the end of Lawrence-lane where, finding himself closely pressed, he suddenly halted, and, pulling his hat over his brows to conceal his features, fiercely confronted his pursuer.

"Why do you dog me thus, fellow?" he cried, drawing his sword. "Would you rob me? Begone, or I will call the watch."

"It is his voice," cried the apprentice. "I have news for you, Mr. Maurice Wyvil. You will not see Amabel to-night. The plague is in her father's house."

"The plague!" exclaimed Wyvil, in an altered tone, and dropping the point of his sword. "Is she smitten by it?"

The apprentice answered by a bitter laugh, and without tarrying longer to enjoy his rival's distress, set off towards Cheapside. Before reaching the end of Lawrence-lane, however, he half repented his conduct, and halted for a moment to see whether Wyvil was following him; but as he could perceive nothing of him, he continued his course.

Entering Cheapside, he observed, to his surprise, a crowd of persons collected near the Cross then standing a little to the east of Wood-street. This cross, which was of great antiquity, and had undergone many mutilations and alterations since its erection in 1486, when it boasted, amongst other embellishments, images of the Virgin and Saint Edward the Confessor, was still not without some pretensions to architectural beauty. In form it was hexagonal, and composed of three tiers, rising from one another like the divisions of a telescope, each angle being supported by a pillar surmounted by a statue, while the intervening niches were filled up with sculptures, intended to represent some of the sovereigns of England. The structure, which was of considerable height, was crowned by a large gilt cross. Its base was protected by a strong wooden railing. About a hundred yards to the east stood a smaller hexagonal tower, likewise ornamented with carvings, and having a figure on its conical summit blowing a horn. This was the Conduit. Midway between these buildings the crowd, alluded to above, was collected.

As Leonard drew near, he found the assemblage was listening to the exhortations of an enthusiast, whom he instantly recognised from the description he had heard of him from Blaize. The name of this half-crazed being was Solomon Eagle. He had been a quaker, but since the breaking out of the plague he had abandoned his home and friends, and wandered about the streets at night denouncing doom to the city. He was a tall gaunt man, with long jet black hair, hanging in disordered masses over his shoulders. His eyes were large and black, and blazed with insane lustre, and his looks were so wild and terrific, that it required no great stretch of imagination to convert him into the genius of the pestilence. Entirely stripped of apparel, except that his loins were girt with a sheepskin, in imitation of Saint John in the Wilderness, he bore upon his head a brazier of flaming coals, the lurid light of which falling upon his sable locks and tawny skin, gave him an almost unearthly appearance.

Impelled by curiosity, Leonard paused for a moment to listen to him, and heard him thunder forth the following denunciation:—"And now, therefore, as the prophet Jeremiah saith, 'I have this day declared it to you, but ye have not obeyed the voice of the Lord your God, nor anything for the which he hath sent me unto you. Now, therefore, know certainly, that ye shall die by the sword, by the famine, and by the pestilence.' Again, in the words of the prophet Amos, the Lord saith unto you, by my mouth, 'I have sent among you the pestilence after the manner of Egypt, yet have you not returned unto me. Therefore, will I do this unto thee, O Israel; and because I will do this unto thee, prepare to meet thy God!' Do you hear this, O sinners? God will proceed against you in the day of his wrath, though he hath borne with you in the day of his patience? O how many hundred years hath he spared this city, notwithstanding its great provocations and wickedness! But now he will no longer show it pity, but will pour out his wrath upon it! Plagues shall come upon it, and desolation, and it shall be utterly burnt with fire,—for strong is the Lord who judgeth it!"

His address concluded, he ran along at a swift pace, shrieking in a voice that caused many persons to throw open their windows to listen to him,—"Awake! sinners, awake!—The plague is at your doors! The grave yawns for you. Awake! and repent." And followed by the crowd, many of whom kept up with him, he ran on vociferating in this manner till he was out of hearing.

Hurrying forward in the opposite direction, Leonard glanced at the ancient and picturesque houses on either side of the way,—now bathed in the moonlight, and apparently hushed in repose and security—and he could not repress a shudder as he reflected that an evil angel was, indeed, abroad, who might suddenly arouse their slumbering inmates to despair and death. His thoughts took another turn as he entered the precincts of Saint Paul's, and surveyed the venerable and majestic fabric before him. His eye rested upon its innumerable crocketed pinnacles, its buttresses, its battlements, and upon the magnificent rose window terminating the choir. The apprentice had no especial love for antiquity, but being of an imaginative turn, the sight of this reverend structure conjured up old recollections, and brought to mind the Collegiate Church of his native town.

"Shall I ever see Manchester again?" he sighed. "Shall I take Amabel with me there? Alas! I doubt it! If I survive the plague, she, I fear, will never be mine."

Musing thus, he scanned the roof of the cathedral, and noticing its stunted central tower, could not help thinking how much more striking its effect must have been, when the lofty spire it once supported was standing. The spire, it may be remarked, was twice destroyed by lightning—first, in February, 1444; and subsequently in June, 1561, when it was entirely burnt down, and never rebuilt. Passing the Convocation House, which then stood at one side of the southern transept, Leonard struck down Paul's-chain, and turning to the right, speeded along Great Knight-rider-street, until he reached an old habitation at the corner of the passage leading to Doctors' Commons.

Knocking at the door, an elderly servant presently appeared, and in answer to his inquiries whether Doctor Hodges was at home, stated that he had gone out about half an hour ago to attend Mr. Fisher, a proctor, who had been suddenly attacked by the plague at his residence in Bartholomew-close, near Smithfield.

"I am come on the same errand," said Leonard, "and must see your master instantly."

"If you choose to go to Bartholomew-close," replied the servant, "you may possibly meet with him. Mr. Fisher's house is the last but two, on the right, before you come to the area in front of the church."

"I can easily find it," returned Leonard, "and will run there as fast as I can. But if your master should pass me on the road, beseech him to go instantly to Stephen Bloundel's, the grocer, in Wood-street."

The servant assenting, Leonard hastily retraced his steps, and traversing Blow-bladder-street, and Saint Martin's-le-grand, passed through Aldersgate. He then shaped his course through the windings of Little Britain and entered Duck-lane. He was now in a quarter fearfully assailed by the pestilence. Most of the houses had the fatal sign upon their doors—a red cross, of a foot long, with the piteous words above it, "LORD HAVE MERCY UPON US," in characters so legible that they could be easily distinguished by the moonlight, while a watchman, with a halbert in his hand, kept guard outside.

Involuntarily drawing in his breath, Leonard quickened his pace. But he met with an unexpected and fearful interruption. Just as he reached the narrow passage leading from Duck-lane to Bartholomew-close, he heard the ringing of a bell, followed by a hoarse voice, crying, "Bring out your dead—bring out your dead!" He then perceived that a large, strangely-shaped cart stopped up the further end of the passage, and heard a window open, and a voice call out that all was ready. The next moment, a light was seen at the door, and a coffin was brought out, and placed in the cart. This done, the driver, who was smoking a pipe, cracked his whip, and put the vehicle in motion.

Shrinking into a door-way, and holding a handkerchief to his face to avoid breathing the pestilential effluvia, Leonard saw that there were other coffins in the cart, and that it was followed by two persons in long black cloaks. The vehicle itself, which was fashioned like an open hearse, was of the same sombre colour, relieved by some fantastical designs, painted in white, emblematic of the pestilence; while the horse, of the large black Flanders breed, was decorated with funeral trappings. To Leonard's inexpressible horror, the cart again stopped opposite him, and the driver, ringing his bell, repeated his doleful cry. While another coffin was brought out, and placed with the rest, a window in the next house was opened, and a woman, looking forth, screamed, "Is Anselm Chowles, the coffin-maker, there?"

"Yes, here I am, Mother Malmayns," replied one of the men in black cloaks, looking up as he spoke, and exhibiting features so hideous, and stamped with such a revolting expression, that Leonard's blood curdled at the sight. "What do you want with me?" he added.

"I want you to carry away old Michael Norborough," replied the woman.

"What, is the old miser gone at last?" exclaimed Chowles with an atrocious laugh. "But how shall I get paid for a coffin?"

"You may pay yourself with what you can find in the house," replied Mother Malmayns; "or you may carry him to the grave without one, if you prefer it."

"No, no, that won't do," returned Chowles. "I've other customers to attend to who will pay; and, besides, I want to get home. I expect friends at supper. Good night, Mother Malmayns. You know where to find me, if you want me. Move on, Jones, or you'll never reach Saint Sepulchre's."

The woman angrily expostulated with him, and some further parley ensued,—Leonard did not tarry to hear what, but rushing past them, gained Bartholomew-close.

He soon reached the proctor's house, and found it marked with the fatal cross. Addressing a watchman at the door, he learnt, to his great dismay, that Doctor Hodges had been gone more than a quarter of an hour. "He was too late," said the man. "Poor Mr. Fisher had breathed his last before he arrived, and after giving some directions to the family as to the precautions they ought to observe, the doctor departed."

"How unfortunate!" exclaimed Leonard. "I have missed him a second time, but I will run back to his house instantly."

"You will not find him at home," returned the watchman. "He is gone to Saint Paul's, to attend a sick person."

"To Saint Paul's at this hour!" cried the apprentice. "Why, no one is there except the vergers, or the sexton."

"He is gone to visit the sexton, who is ill of the plague," replied the watchman. "I have told you all I know about him. You can do what you think best."

Determined to make another effort before giving in, Leonard hurried back as fast as he could. While threading Duck-lane, he heard the doleful bell again, and perceived the dead-cart standing before a house, from which two small coffins were brought. Hurrying past the vehicle, he remarked that its load was fearfully increased, but that the coffin-maker and his companion had left it. Another minute had not elapsed before he reached Aldersgate, and, passing through the postern, he beheld a light at the end of Saint Anne's-lane, and heard the terrible voice of Solomon Eagle, calling to the sleepers to "awake, and repent."

Shutting his ears to the cry, Leonard did not halt till he reached the great western door of the cathedral, against which he knocked. His first summons remaining unanswered, he repeated it, and a wicket was then opened by a grey-headed verger, with a lantern in his hand, who at first was very angry at being disturbed, but on learning whom the applicant was in search of, and that the case was one of urgent necessity, he admitted that the doctor was in the Cathedral at the time.

"Or rather I should say," he added, "he is in Saint Faith's. I will conduct you to him, if you think proper. Doctor Hodges is a good man,—a charitable man,"—he continued, "and attends the poor for nothing. He is now with Matthew Malmayns, the sexton, who was taken ill of the plague yesterday, and will get nothing but thanks,—if he gets those,—for his fee. But, follow me, young man, follow me."

So saying, he shut the wicket, and led the way along the transept. The path was uneven, many of the flags having been removed, and the verger often paused to throw a light upon the ground, and warn his companion of a hole.

On arriving at the head of the nave, Leonard cast his eyes down it, and was surprised at the magical effect of the moonlight upon its magnificent avenue of pillars; the massive shafts on the left being completely illuminated by the silvery beams, while those on the right lay in deep shadow.

"Ay, it is a noble structure," replied the old verger, noticing his look of wonder and admiration, "and, like many a proud human being, has known better days. It has seen sad changes in my time, for I recollect it when good Queen Bess ruled the land. But, come along, young man,—you have something else to think of now."

Bestowing a momentary glance upon the matchless choir, with its groined roof, its clerestory windows, its arched openings, its carved stalls, and its gorgeous rose-window, Leonard followed his conductor through a small deerway on the left of the southern transept, and descending a flight of stone steps, entered a dark and extensive vault, for such it seemed. The feeble light of the lantern fell upon ranks of short heavy pillars, supporting a ponderous arched roof.

"You are now in Saint Faith's," observed the verger, "and above you is the choir of Saint Paul's."

Leonard took no notice of the remark, but silently crossing the nave of this beautiful subterranean church (part of which still exists), traversed its northern aisle. At length, the verger stopped before the entrance of a small chapel, once dedicated to Saint John the Baptist, but now devoted to a less sacred purpose. As they advanced, Leonard observed a pile of dried skulls and bones in one corner, a stone coffin, strips of woollen shrouds, fragments of coffins, mattocks, and spades. It was evidently, half a charnel,—half a receptacle for the sexton's tools.

"If you choose to open that door," said the verger, pointing to one at the lower end of the chamber, "you will find him you seek. I shall go no further."

Summoning up all his resolution, Leonard pushed open the door. A frightful scene met his gaze. At one side of a deep low-roofed vault, the architecture of which was of great antiquity, and showed that it had been a place of burial was stretched a miserable pallet, and upon it, covered by a single blanket, lay a wretch, whose groans and struggles proclaimed the anguish he endured. A lamp was burning on the floor, and threw a sickly light upon the agonized countenance of the sufferer. He was a middle-aged man, with features naturally harsh, but which now, contracted by pain, had assumed a hideous expression. An old crone, who proved to be his mother, and a young man, who held him down in bed by main force, tended him. He was rambling in a frightful manner; and as his ravings turned upon the most loathly matters, it required some firmness to listen to them.

At a little distance from him, upon a bench, sat a stout, shrewd-looking, but benevolent little personage, somewhere between forty and fifty. This was Doctor Hodges. He had a lancet in his hand, with which he had just operated upon the sufferer, and which he was now wiping on a cloth. As Leonard entered the vault, he observed to the attendants of the sick man, "He will recover. The tumour has discharged its venom. Keep him as warm as you can, and do not let him leave his bed for two days. All depends upon that. I will send him proper medicines and some blankets shortly. If he takes cold, it will be fatal."

The young man promised to attend to the doctor's injunctions, and the old woman mumbled her thanks.

"Where is Mrs. Malmayns?" asked Doctor Hodges. "I am surprised not to see her. Is she afraid of the distemper?"

"Afraid of it!—not she," replied the old woman. "Since the plague has raged so dreadfully, she has gone out as a nurse to the sick, and my poor son has seen nothing of her."

Leonard then recollected that he had heard the woman, who called out of the miser's house, addressed as Mother Malmayns by the coffin-maker, and had no doubt she was the sexton's wife. His entrance having been so noiseless that it passed unnoticed, he now stepped forward, and, addressing Doctor Hodges, acquainted him with his errand.

"What!" exclaimed the doctor, as soon as he concluded, "a son of Stephen Bloundel, the worthy grocer of Wood-street, attacked by the plague! I will go with you instantly, young man. I have a great regard for your master—a very great regard. There is not a better man living. The poor lad must be saved, if possible." And hastily repeating his instructions to the attendants of the sick man, he left the vault with the apprentice.

They found the verger in the charnel, and before quitting it, the doctor drew a small flask of canary from his pocket, and applied it to his lips.

"This is my anti-pestilential drink," he remarked with a smile, "and it has preserved me from contagion hitherto. You must let us out at the south door, friend," he added to the verger, "for I shall be obliged to step home for a moment, and it will save time. Come with me, young man, and tell me what has been done for the grocer's son."

As they traversed the gloomy aisles of Saint Faith, and mounted to the upper structure, Leonard related all that had taken place since poor Stephen's seizure. The doctor strongly expressed his approval of what had been done, and observed, "It could not be better. With heaven's help, I have no doubt we shall save him, and I am truly glad of it for his father's sake."

By this time, they had reached the southern door, and the verger having unlocked it, they issued forth. It was still bright moonlight, and Leonard, whose mind was greatly relieved by the assurances of the physician, felt in some degree reconciled to the delay, and kept up his part in the conversation promoted by his companion. The doctor, who was an extremely kind-hearted man, and appeared to have a great regard for the grocer, made many inquiries as to his family, and spoke in terms of the highest admiration of the beauty of his eldest daughter. The mention of Amabel's name, while it made Leonard's cheek burn, rekindled all his jealousy of Wyvil, and he tried to make some excuse to get away, but his companion would not hear of it.

"I tell you there is no hurry," said the doctor. "All is going on as well as possible. I will make your excuses to your master."

On reaching the doctor's house they were ushered into a large room, surrounded with book-shelves and cases of anatomical preparations. Hodges seated himself at a table, on which a shaded lamp was placed, and writing a prescription, desired his servant to get it made up at a neighbouring apothecary's, and to take it with half a dozen blankets, to the sexton of Saint Paul's. He then produced a bottle of medicated canary, and pouring it a lea glass for the apprentice, drained another himself.

"I will answer for its virtue," he said. "It is a sure preservative against the plague."

Having furnished himself with several small packets of simples, a few pots of ointment, one or two phials, and a case of surgical instruments, he told Leonard he was ready to attend him.

"We will go round by Warwick-lane," he added. "I must call upon Chowles, the coffin-maker. It will not detain us a moment,—and I have an order to give him."

The mention of this name brought to Leonard's mind the hideous attendant on the dead-cart, and he had no doubt he was the person in question. It did not become him, however, to make a remark, and they set out.

Mounting Addle-hill, and threading Ave Maria-lane, they entered Warwick-lane, and about half way up the latter thoroughfare, the doctor stopped before a shop, bearing on its immense projecting sign the representation of a body lying in state, and covered with scutcheons, underneath which was written, "ANSELM CHOWLES, COFFIN-MAKER."

"I do not think you will find Mr. Chowles at home," observed Leonard; "for I saw him with the dead-cart not half an hour ago."

"Very likely," returned the doctor; "but I shall see one of his men. The coffin-maker's business is now carried on in the night time," he added with a sigh, "and he drives a flourishing trade. These sad times will make his fortune."

As he spoke, he rapped with his cane at the door, which, after a little delay, was opened by a young man in a carpenter's dress, with a hammer in his hand. On seeing who it was, this person exhibited great confusion, and would have retired, but the doctor, pushing him aside, asked for his master.

"You cannot just now, sir," replied the other, evidently considerably embarrassed. "He is just come home greatly fatigued, and is about to retire to rest."

"No matter," returned the doctor, entering a room, in which three or four other men were at work, hastily nailing up coffins, "I must see him."

No further opposition being offered, Hodges, followed by the apprentice, marched towards an inner room. Just as he reached the door, a burst of loud laughter, evidently proceeding from a numerous party, arose from within, and a harsh voice was heard chanting the following strains:—

SONG OF THE PLAGUE.

I.

To others the Plague a foe may be,
 To me 'tis a friend,—not an enemy
 My coffins and coffers alike it fills,
 And the richer I grow, the more it kills.
Drink the Plague! Drink the Plague!

II.

For months, for years, may it spend its rage
 On lusty manhood and trembling age;
 Though half mankind of the scourge should die,
 My coffins will sell,—so what care I?
Drink the Plague! Drink the Plague!

Loud acclamations followed the song, and the doctor, who was filled with disgust and astonishment, opened the door. He absolutely recoiled at the scene presented to his gaze. In the midst of a large room, the sides of which were crowded with coffins piled to the very ceiling, sat about a dozen personages, with pipes in their mouths, and flasks and glasses before them. Their seats were coffins, and their table was a coffin set upon a bier. Seated on a pyramid of coffins, gradually diminishing in size as the pile approached its apex, Chowles was waving a glass in one hand, and a bottle in the other, when the doctor made his appearance. A more hideous personage cannot be imagined. He was clothed in a suit of rusty black, which made his skeleton limbs look yet more lean and cadaverous. His head was perfectly bald, and its yellow skin, divested of any artificial covering, glistened like polished ivory. His throat was long and scraggy, and supported a head unrivalled for ugliness. His nose had been broken in his youth, and was almost compressed flat with his face. His few remaining teeth were yellow and discoloured, with large gaps between them. His eyes were bright, and set in deep cavernous recesses, and now that he was more than half intoxicated, gleamed with unnatural lustre. The friends by whom he was surrounded were congenial spirits,—searchers, watchmen, buriers, apothecaries, and other wretches who, like himself, rejoiced in the pestilence, because it was a source of profit to them.

At one corner of the room, with a part-emptied glass before her, and several articles in her lap, which she hastily pocketed on the entrance of the doctor, sat the plague-nurse, Mother Malmayns—and Leonard thought her, if possible, more villainous-looking than her companions. She was a rough raw-boned woman, with sandy hair and light brows, a sallow, freckled complexion, a nose with wide nostrils, and a large thick-lipped mouth. She had, moreover, a look of mingled cunning and ferocity inexpressibly revolting.

Sharply rebuking Chowles, who, in springing from his lofty seat, upset several of the topmost coffins, the doctor gave him some directions, and turning to the nurse, informed her of her husband's condition, and ordered her to go to him immediately. Mother Malmayns arose, and glancing significantly at the coffin-maker, took her departure.

Repeating his injunctions to Chowles in a severe tone, the doctor followed, and seeing her take the way towards Saint Paul's, proceeded at a brisk pace along Paternoster-row with the apprentice. In a few minutes, they reached Wood-street, and knocking at the door, were admitted by Blaize.

"Heaven be praised you are come at last," exclaimed the porter. "Our master began to think something had happened to you."

"It is all my fault," returned Doctor Hodges. "But how is the young man?"

"Better, much better, as I understand," replied Blaize. "But I have not seen him."

"Come, that's well," rejoined Hodges. "Lead me to his room."

"Leonard will show you the way," returned the porter, holding back.

Glancing angrily at Blaize, the apprentice conducted the doctor to the inner room, where they found the grocer, with the Bible on his knee, watching by the bedside of his son. He was delighted at their appearance, but looked inquisitively at his apprentice for some explanation of his long absence. This Hodges immediately gave, and having examined the sufferer, he relieved the anxious father by declaring that, with due care, he had little doubt of his recovery.

"God be praised!" exclaimed Bloundel, falling on his knees.

Hodges then gave minute directions to the grocer as to how he was to proceed, and told him it would be necessary for some time to keep his family separate. To this Bloundel readily agreed. The doctor's next inquiries were whether notice had been given to the Examiner of Health, and the grocer referring to Leonard, the latter acknowledged that he had forgotten it, but undertook to repair his omission at once.

With this view, he quitted the room, and was hastening towards the shop, when he observed a figure on the back stairs. Quickly mounting them, he overtook on the landing Maurice Wyvil.

CHAPTER III.

THE GAMESTER AND THE BULLY.

BEFORE proceeding further, it will be necessary to retrace our steps for a short time, and see what was done by Maurice Wyvil, after the alarming announcement made to him by the apprentice. Of a selfish nature and ungovernable temper, and seeking only in the pursuit of the grocer's daughter the gratification of his lawless desires, he was filled, in the first instance, with furious disappointment at being robbed of the prize, at the very moment he expected it to fall into his hands. But this feeling was quickly effaced by anxiety respecting his mistress, whose charms, now that there was every probability of losing her (for Leonard's insinuation had led him to believe she was assailed by the pestilence), appeared doubly attractive to him; and scarcely under the governance of reason, he hurried towards Wood-street, resolved to force his way into the house, and see her again at all hazards. His wild design, however, was fortunately prevented. As he passed the end of the court leading to the ancient inn (for it was ancient even at the time of this history), the Swan-with-Two-Necks, in Lad-lane, a young man, as richly attired as himself, and about his own age, who had seen him approaching, suddenly darted from it, and grasping his cloak, detained him.

"I thought it must be you, Wyvil," cried this person. "Where are you running so quickly? I see neither angry father, nor jealous apprentice, at your heels. What has become of the girl? Are you tired of her already?"

"Let me go, Lydyard," returned Wyvil, trying to extricate himself from his companion's hold, who was no other than the gallant who had accompanied him on his first visit to the grocer's shop, and had played his part so adroitly in the scheme devised between them to procure an interview with Amabel,—“let me go, I say. I am in no mood for jesting.”

"Why, what the plague is the matter?" rejoined Lydyard. "Has your mistress played you false? Have you lost your wager?"

"The plague is the matter," replied Wyvil, sternly. "Amabel is attacked by it. I must see her instantly."

"The devil!" exclaimed Lydyard. "Here is a pretty termination to the affair. But if this is really the case, you must not see her. It is one thing to be run through the arm,—which you must own I managed as dexterously as the best master of fence could have done,—and lose a few drops of blood for a mistress, but it is another to brave the plague on her account."

"I care for nothing," replied Wyvil, "I will see her."

"This is madness," remonstrated Lydyard, still maintaining his grasp. "What satisfaction will it afford you to witness her sufferings—to see the frightful ravages made upon her charms by this remorseless disease,—to throw her whole family into consternation, and destroy the little chance she may have of recovery, by your presence? What good will this do? No, you must pay your wager to Sedley, and forget her."

"I cannot forget her," replied Wyvil. "My feelings have undergone a total change. If I am capable of real love, it is for her."

"Real love!" exclaimed Lydyard, in an incredulous tone. "If the subject were not too serious, I should laugh in your face. No doubt you would marry her, and abandon your design upon the rich heiress, pretty Mistress Mallet, whom old Rowley recommended to your attention, and whom the fair Stewart has more than half won for you?"

"I would," replied the other, energetically.

"Nay, then, you are more insatiable than I thought you," rejoined Lydyard, relinquishing his hold; "and the sooner you take the plague, the better. It may cure your present brain fever. I shall go back to Parravicin and the others. You will not require my assistance further."

"I know not," replied Wyvil, distractedly; "I have not yet given up my intention of carrying off the girl."

"If you carry her off in this state," rejoined the other, "it must be to the pest-house. But one word before we part. Who told you she was attacked by the plague?"

"Her father's apprentice," replied Wyvil.

"And you believed him?" demanded Lydyard, with a derisive laugh.

"Undoubtedly," replied Wyvil. "Why not?"

"Because it is evidently a mere trick to frighten you from the house," rejoined Lydyard. "I am surprised so shallow a device should succeed with you."

"I wish I could persuade myself it was a trick," returned Wyvil,—“but the fellow's manner satisfied me he was in earnest.”

“Well, I will not dispute the point, though I feel convinced I am right,” returned Lydyard. “But do not be too precipitate. Since the apprentice has seen you, some alteration may be necessary in your plans. Come with me into the house. A few minutes can make no difference.”

Wyvil suffered himself to be led up the court, and passing through a door on the left, they entered a spacious room, across which ran a long table, furnished at one end with wine and refreshments, and at the other with cards and dice.

Three persons were seated at the table, the most noticeable of whom was a dissipated-looking young man, dressed in the extremity of the prevailing mode, with ruffles of the finest colbertine, three inches in depth, at his wrists; a richly-laced cravat round his throat; white silk hose, adorned with gold clocks; velvet shoes, of the same colour as the hose, fastened with immense roses; a silver-hilted sword, supported by a broad embroidered silk band; and a cloak and doublet of carnation-coloured velvet, woven with gold, and decorated with innumerable glittering points and ribands. He had a flowing wig of flaxen hair, and a broad-leaved hat, looped with a diamond buckle, and placed negligently on the left side of his head. His figure was slight, but extremely well formed; and his features might have been termed handsome, but for their reckless and licentious expression. He was addressed by his companions as Sir Paul Parravicin.

The person opposite him, whose name was Disbrowe and who was likewise a very handsome young man though his features were flushed and disturbed, partly by the wine he had drunk, and partly by his losses at play, was equipped in the splendid accoutrements of a captain in the King's body-guard. His left hand convulsively clutched an empty purse, and his eyes were fixed upon a large sum of money, which he had just handed over to the Knight, and which the latter was carelessly transferring to his pocket.

The last of the three, whose looks betrayed his character—that of a sharper and a bully—called himself Major Pillichody, his pretensions to military rank being grounded upon his service,—so ran his own statement, though it was never clearly substantiated,—in the King's army during the civil wars. Major Pillichody was a man of remarkably fierce exterior. Seamed with many scars, and destitute of the left eye, the orifice of which was covered with a huge black patch, his face was of a deep mulberry colour, clearly attesting his devotion to the bottle, while his nose, which was none of the smallest, was covered with “bubukles and wheelks, and knobs and flames of fire.” He was of the middle size, stoutly built, and given to corpulency, though not so much so as to impair his activity. His attire consisted of a cloak and doublet of scarlet cloth, very much stained and tarnished, and edged with gold lace, likewise the worse for wear, jack-boots with huge funnel tops, spurs with enormous rowels, and a rapier of preposterous length. He wore his own hair, which was swart and woolly, like that of a negro. His hat was fiercely cocked; his gestures swaggering and insolent; and he was perpetually racking his brain to invent new and extraordinary oaths.

“So soon returned!” cried Parravicin, as Wyvil appeared. “Accept my congratulations.”

“And mine!” added Pillichody. “We wild fellows have but to be seen to conquer. Sugar and spice, and all that's nice!” he added, smacking his lips as he filled a glass from a long-necked bottle on the table, “May the grocer's daughter prove sweeter than her father's plums, and more melting than his butter! Is she without? Are we to see her?”

Wyvil made no answer, but walking to the other end of the room, threw himself into a chair, and covering his face with his hands, appeared wrapped in thought. Lydyard took a seat beside him, and endeavoured to engage him in conversation, but finding his efforts fruitless, he desisted.

“Something is wrong,” observed Parravicin to the Major. “He has been foiled in his attempt to carry off the girl. Sedley has won his wager, and it is a heavy sum. Shall we resume our play?” he added to Disbrowe.

“I have nothing more to lose,” replied the young man, filling a large goblet to the brim, and emptying it at a draught. “You are master of every farthing I possess.”

“Hum!” exclaimed Parravicin, taking up a pack of cards, and snapping them between his finger and thumb “You are married, Captain Disbrowe?”

“What if I am?” cried the young man, becoming suddenly pale,—“What if I am?” he repeated.

“I am told your wife is beautiful,” replied Parravicin.

“Beautiful!” ejaculated Pillichody.—“By the well-filled coffers of the widow of Watling-street! she is an angel. Beautiful is not the word. Mrs. Disbrowe is divine.”

“You have never seen her,” said the young man, sternly.

“Ha!—fire and fury! my word doubted,” cried the Major, fiercely. “I have seen her at the play-houses, at the Mulberry-garden, at court, and at church. Not seen her! By the one eye of a Cyclops but I have. You shall hear my description of her, and judge of its correctness. Imprimis, she has a tall and majestic figure, and might be a queen for her dignity.”

“Go on,” said Disbrowe, by no means displeased with the commencement.

“Secondly,” pursued Pillichody, “she has a clear olive complexion, bright black eyes, hair and brows to match, a small foot, a pretty turn-up nose, a dimpling cheek, a mole upon her throat, the rosiest lips imaginable, an alluring look——”

"No more," interrupted Disbrowe. "It is plain you have never seen her."

"Unbelieving Pagan!" exclaimed the Major, clapping his hand furiously upon his sword. "I have done more,—I have spoken with her."

"A lie," replied Disbrowe, hurling a dice-box at his head.

"Ha!" roared Pillichody, in a voice of thunder, and pushing back his chair till it was stopped by the wall. "Death and fiends! I will make minced-meat of your heart, and send it as a love-offering to your wife."

And, whipping out his long rapier, he would have assaulted Disbrowe, if Sir Paul had not interposed, and commanded him authoritatively to put up his blade.

"You shall have your revenge in a safer way," he whispered.

"Well, Sir Paul," rejoined the bully, with affected reluctance, "as you desire it, I will spare the young man's life. I must wash away the insult in burgundy, since I cannot do so in blood." With this, he emptied the flask next him, and called to a drawer, who was in attendance, in an imperious tone, to bring two more bottles.

Parravicin, meanwhile, picked up the dice-box, and, seating himself, spread a large heap of gold on the table.

"I mentioned your wife, Captain Disbrowe," he said, addressing the young officer, who anxiously watched his movements, "not with any intention of giving you offence, but to show you that, although you have lost your money, you have still a valuable stake left."

"I do not understand you, Sir Paul," returned Disbrowe, with a look of indignant surprise.

"To be plain, then," replied Parravicin, "I have won from you two hundred pounds,—all you possess. You are a ruined man, and as such will run any hazard to retrieve your losses. I give you a last chance. I will stake all my winnings, nay double the amount, against your wife. You have a key of the house you inhabit, by which you admit yourself at all hours, so at least the Major informs me. If I win, that key shall be mine. I will take my chance for the rest. Do you understand me now?"

"I do," replied the young man, with concentrated fury. "I understand that you are a villain. You have robbed me of my money, and would rob me of my honour."

"These are harsh words, sir," replied the Knight calmly, "but let them pass. We will play first, and fight afterwards. But you refuse my challenge?"

"It is false!" replied Disbrowe, fiercely, "I accept it." And producing a key, he threw it on the table. "My life is, in truth, set on the die," he added, with a desperate look,— "for if I lose I will not survive my shame."

"You will not forget our terms," observed Parravicin. "I am to be your representative to-night. You can return home to-morrow."

"Throw, sir,—throw," cried the young man, fiercely.

"Pardon me," replied the Knight; "the first cast is with you. A single main decides it."

"Be it so," returned Disbrowe, seizing the box. And as he shook the dice with a frenzied air, the Major and Lydyard drew near the table, and even Wyvil roused himself to watch the result.

"Twelve!" cried Disbrowe, as he removed the box. "My honour is saved! My fortune retrieved—Huzza!"

"Not so fast," returned Parravicin, shaking the box in his turn. "You were a little too hasty," he added, uncovering the dice, "I am twelve, too. We must throw again."

"This to decide," cried the young officer, again rattling the dice—"Six!"

Parravicin smiled, took the box, and threw ten!

"Perdition!" ejaculated Disbrowe, striking his brow with his clenched hand. "What devil tempted me to my undoing?—My wife trusted to this profligate. Horror!—it must not be!"

"It is too late to retract," replied Parravicin, taking up the key, and turning with a triumphant look to his friends.

Disbrowe noticed the smile, and stung beyond endurance, drew his sword, and called to the Knight to defend himself.

In an instant, passes were exchanged. But the conflict was brief. Fortune, as before, declared herself in favour of Parravicin. He disarmed his assailant, who rushed out of the room, uttering the wildest ejaculations of rage and despair.

"I told you you should have your revenge," observed the Knight to Pillichody, as soon as Disbrowe was gone. "Is his wife really as beautiful as you represent her?"

"Words are too feeble to paint her charms," replied the Major. "Shafts of Cupid! she must be seen to be appreciated."

"Enough!" returned Parravicin. "I have not made a bad night's work of it, so far. Faith, Wyvil, I pity you. To lose a heavy wager is provoking enough—but to lose a pretty mistress is the devil."

"I have lost neither yet," replied Wyvil, who had completely recovered his spirits, and joined in the general merriment occasioned by the foregoing occurrence. "I have been baffled, not defeated. What say you to an exchange of mistresses? I am so diverted with your adventure, that I am half inclined to give you the grocer's daughter for Disbrowe's wife. She is a superb creature—languid as a Circassian, and passionate as an Andalusian."

"I can't agree to the exchange, especially after your rapturous description," returned Parravicin, "but I'll stake Mrs. Disbrowe against Amabel. The winner shall have both. A single cast shall decide, as before."

"No," replied Wyvil, "I could not resign Amabel, if I lost. And the luck is all on your side to-night."

"As you please," rejoined the Knight, sweeping the glittering pile into his pocket. "Drawer, another bottle of burgundy. A health to our mistresses!" he added, quaffing a brimmer.

"A health to the grocer's daughter!" cried Wyvil, with difficulty repressing a shudder, as he uttered the pledge.

"A health to the rich widow of Watling-street," cried Pillichody, draining a bumper, "and may I soon call her mine."

"I have no mistress to toast," said Lydyard; "and I have drunk wine enough. Do not forget, gentlemen, that the plague is abroad."

"You are the death's-head at the feast, Lydyard," rejoined Parravicin, setting down his glass. "I hate the idea of the plague. It poisons all our pleasures. We must meet at noon to-morrow at the Smyrna to compare notes as to our successes. Before we separate, can I be of any further service to you, Wyvil? I came here to enjoy your triumph, but, egad, I have found so admirable a bubble in that hot-headed Disbrowe, whom I brought here to while away the time, that I must demand your congratulations upon mine."

"You have certainly achieved an easy victory over the husband," returned Wyvil, "and I trust your success with the wife will be commensurate. I require no further assistance. What I have to do must be done alone. Lydyard will accompany me to the house, and then I must shift for myself."

"Nay, we will all see you safe inside," returned Parravicin. "We shall pass by the shop. I know it well, having passed it a hundred times, in the vain hope of catching a glimpse of its lovely inmate."

"I am glad it was a vain hope," replied Wyvil; "but I must scale a wall to surprise the garrison."

"Then you will need the rope-ladder," replied Lydyard; "it is in readiness."

"I will carry it," said Pillichody, picking up the ladder, which was lying in a corner of the room, and throwing it over his shoulder. "Bombs and batteries! I like to be an escalader when the forts of love are stormed."

The party then set out. As they proceeded, Parravicin ascertained from the Major that Disbrowe's house was situated in a small street leading out of Piccadilly, but as he could not be quite sure that he understood his informant aright, he engaged him to accompany him and point it out.

By this time, they had reached Wood-street, and, keeping in the shade, reconnoitred the house. But though Wyvil clapped his hands, blew a shrill whistle, and made other signals, no answer was returned, nor was a light seen at any of the upper windows. On the contrary, all was as still and silent as death.

The grocer's was a large old-fashioned house, built about the middle of the preceding century, or perhaps earlier, and had four stories, each projecting over the other, till the pile seemed completely to overhang the street. The entire front, except the upper story, which was protected by oaken planks, was covered with pannels of the same timber, and the projections were supported by heavy beams, embellished with grotesque carvings. Three deeply-embayed windows, having stout wooden bars, filled with minute diamond panes, set in leaden frames, were allotted to each floor; while the like number of gables, ornamented with curiously carved coignes, and long moulded leaden spouts, shooting far into the street, finished the roof. A huge sign, with a device, and the owner's name upon it, hung before the door.

After carefully examining the house, peeping through the chinks in the lower shutters, and discovering the grocer seated by the bedside of his son, though he could not make out the object of his solicitude, Wyvil decided upon attempting an entrance by the back-yard. To reach it, a court and a narrow alley, leading to an open space surrounded by high walls, had to be traversed. Arrived at this spot, Wyvil threw one end of the rope ladder over the wall, which was about twelve feet high, and speedily succeeding in securing it, mounted, and drawing it up after him, waved his hand to his companions, and disappeared on the other side. After waiting for a moment to listen, and hearing a window open, they concluded he had gained admittance, and turned to depart.

"And now for Mrs. Disbrowe," cried Parravicin. "We shall find a coach, or a chair, in Cheapside. Can I take you westward, Lydyard?"

Lydyard declined the offer, saying, "I will not desert Wyvil. I feel certain he will get into some scrape, and may need me to help him out of it. Take care of yourself, Parravicin. Beware of the plague, and of what is worse than the plague, an injured husband. Good night, Major."

"Farewell, sir," returned Pillichody, raising his hat. "A merry watching, and a good catching, as the sentinels were wont to say, when I served King Charles the First. Sir Paul, I attend you."

CHAPTER IV.

THE INTERVIEW.

MAURICE WYVIL, as his friends conjectured, had found his way into the house. Creeping through the window, and entering a passage, he moved noiselessly along till he reached the head of the kitchen stairs, where hearing voices below, and listening to what was said, he soon ascertained from the discourse of the speakers, who were no other than old Josyna and Patience, that it was not the grocer's daughter, but one of his sons, who was attacked by the plague, and that Amabel was in perfect health, though confined in her mother's bed-room.

Overjoyed at the information he had thus acquired, he retired as noiselessly as he could, and after searching about for a short time, discovered the main staircase, and ascended it on the points of his feet. He had scarcely, however, mounted a dozen steps, when a door opened, and Blaize crawled along the passage, groaning to himself, and keeping his eyes bent upon the ground. Seeing he was unnoticed, Wyvil gained the landing, and, treading softly, placed his ear at every door, until at last the musical accents of Amabel convinced him he had hit upon the right one.

His heart beat so violently that for a few seconds he was unable to move. Becoming calmer, he tried the door, and finding it locked, rapped with his knuckles against it. The grocer's wife demanded who was there, but Wyvil, instead of returning an answer, repeated his application. The same demand followed, and in a louder key. Still no answer. A third summons, however, so alarmed Mrs. Bloundel, that forgetful of her husband's injunctions, she opened the door, and looked out. But as Wyvil had hastily retired into a recess, she could see no one.

Greatly frightened and perplexed, Mrs. Bloundel rushed to the head of the stairs to see whether there was any one below, and as she did so, Wyvil slipped into the room, and locked the door. The only object he beheld—for he had eyes for nothing else—was Amabel, who, seeing him, uttered a faint scream. Claspings her in his arms, Wyvil forgot, in the delirium of the moment, the jeopardy in which he was placed.

"Do you know what has happened?" cried Amabel, extricating herself from his embrace.

"I know all," replied her lover; "I would risk a thousand deaths for your sake. You must fly with me."

"Fly!" exclaimed Amabel, "at such a time as this?—my brother dying—the whole house, perhaps, infected! How can you ask me to fly?—Why have you come hither? You will destroy me."

"Not so, sweet Amabel," replied Wyvil, ardently. "I would bear you from the baneful influence of this horrible disease. I am come to save you. I will not stir without you."

"What shall I do?" cried Amabel, distractedly. "But I am rightly punished for my disobedience and ingratitude to my dear father. Oh! Wyvil, I did not deserve this from you."

"Hear me, Amabel," cried her lover, "I implore your forgiveness. What I have done has been from irresistible passion, and from no other cause. You promised to meet me to-night. Nay, you half consented to fly with me. I have prepared all for it. I came hither burning with impatience for the meeting. I received no signal, but encountering your father's apprentice, was informed that you were sick of the plague. Imagine my horror and distress at the intelligence. I thought it would have killed me. I determined, however, at all risks, to see you once more,—to clasp you in my arms before you died,—to die with you, if need be. I accomplished my purpose. I entered the house unobserved. I overheard the servants say it was your brother who was smitten by the plague, not you. I also learnt that you were in your mother's room. I found the door, and by a fortunate device obtained admittance. Now you know all, and will you not fly with me?"

"How can I fly?" cried Amabel, gazing wildly round the room as if in search of some place of refuge or escape, and noticing her little sister, Christiana, who was lying asleep in the bed,—“Oh! how I envy that innocent,” she murmured.

"Think of nothing but yourself," rejoined Wyvil, seizing her hand. "If you stay here, it will be to perish of the plague. Trust to me, and I will secure your flight."

"I cannot—I dare not," cried Amabel, resisting him with all her force.

"You must come," cried Wyvil, dragging her along.

As he spoke, Mrs. Bloundel, who had been down to Blaize's room to ascertain what was the matter, returned. Trying the door, and finding it fastened, she became greatly alarmed, and called to Amabel to open it directly.

"It is my mother," cried Amabel. "Pity me, heaven! I shall die with shame."

"Heed her not," rejoined Wyvil, in a deep whisper—"in her surprise and confusion at seeing me, she will not be able to stop us. Do not hesitate. There is not a moment to lose."

"What is the matter, child?" cried Mrs. Bloundel. "Why have you fastened the door? Is there any one in the room with you?"

"She hears us," whispered Amabel. "What shall I do? You must not be seen."

"There is no use in further concealment," cried Wyvil. "You are mine, and twenty mothers should not bar the way."

"Hold!" cried Amabel, disengaging herself by a sudden effort; "I have gone too far—but not so far as you imagine. I am not utterly lost."

And before she could be prevented, she rushed to the door, threw it open, and flung herself into her mother's arms, who uttered an exclamation of terror at beholding Wyvil. The latter, though filled with rage and confusion, preserved an unmoved exterior, and folded his arms upon his breast.

"And so it was you who knocked at the door!" cried Mrs. Bloundel, regarding the gallant with a look of fury—"it was you who contrived to delude me into opening it! I do not ask why you have come hither like a thief in the night, because I require no information on the subject. You are come to dishonour my child—to carry her away from those who love her, and cherish her, and would preserve her from such mischievous serpents as you. But, Heaven be praised! I have caught you before your wicked design could be effected. Oh! Amabel, my child, my child," she added, straining her to her bosom, "I had rather—far rather—see you stricken with the plague like your poor brother, though I felt there was not a hope of your recovery, than you should fall into the hands of this Satan!"

"I have been greatly to blame, dear mother," returned Amabel, bursting into tears; "and I shall neither seek to exculpate myself, nor conceal what I have done. I have deceived you, and my father. I have secretly encouraged the addresses of this gentleman. Nay, if the plague had not broken out in our house to night, I should have flown from it with him."

"You shock me greatly, child," returned Mrs. Bloundel, "but you relieve me at the same time. Make a clean breast, and hide nothing from me."

"I have nothing more to tell, dear mother," replied Amabel, "except that Maurice Wyvil has been in the room ever since you left it, and might, perhaps, have carried me off, in spite of my resistance, if you had not returned when you did."

"It was, indeed, a providential interference," rejoined Mrs. Bloundel. "From what a snare of the Evil One—from what a pitfall have you been preserved!"

"I feel that I have had a narrow escape, dear mother," replied Amabel. "Pardon me. I do not deserve your forgiveness. But I will never offend you more."

"I forgive you, from my heart, child, and will trust you," returned Mrs. Bloundel, in a voice broken by emotion.

"That is more than I would," thought Maurice Wyvil. "A woman who has once deceived those she holds dear, will not fail to do so a second time. The fairest promises are forgotten when the danger is past."

"Mr. Wyvil, if you have a particle of regard for me, you will instantly leave the house," said Amabel, turning to him.

"If I had my own way, he should leave it through the window," said Mrs. Bloundel. "And if he tarries a minute longer I will give the alarm."

"You hear this, sir," cried Amabel;—"go, I intreat you."

"I yield to circumstances, Amabel," replied Wyvil, "but think not I resign you. Come what will, and however I may be foiled, I will not desist till I make you mine."

"I tremble to hear him," cried Mrs. Bloundel, "and could not have believed such depravity existed. Quit the house, sir, directly, or I will have you turned out of it."

"Do not remain another moment," implored Amabel. "Do not,—do not."

"Since I have no other way of proving my love, I must perforce obey," returned Wyvil, trying to snatch her hand, and press it to his lips, but she withdrew it, and clung more closely to her mother. "We part," he added, significantly, "only for a time."

Quitting the room, he was about to descend the stairs, when Mrs. Bloundel, who had followed to see him safely off the premises, hearing a noise below, occasioned by the return of Leonard with the doctor, cautioned him to wait. A further delay was caused by Blaize, who, stationing himself at the foot of the stairs with a light in his hand, appeared unwilling to move. Apprehensive of a discovery, Mrs. Bloundel then directed the gallant to the back staircase, and he had got about half way down, when he was surprised by Leonard Holt, as before related.

At the very moment that Wyvil was overtaken on the landing by the apprentice, Amabel appeared at the door of her chamber with a light. The different emotions of each party at this unexpected rencontre may be imagined. Leonard Holt, with a breast boiling with jealous rage, prepared to attack his rival. He had no weapon about him, having left his cudgel in the shop, but he doubled his fists, and, nerved by passion, felt he had the force of a Hercules in his arm. Wyvil in his turn, kept his hand upon his sword, and glanced at his mistress, as if seeking instructions how to act. At length, Mrs. Bloundel, who formed one of the group, spoke.

"Leonard Holt," she said, "show this person out at the door. Do not lose sight of him for an instant, and as soon as he is gone, try to find out how he entered the house."

"He entered it like a robber," returned Leonard, glancing fiercely at the gallant, "and if I did my strict duty, I should seize him, and give him in charge to the watch. He has come here for the purpose of stealing my master's chief valuable—his daughter."

"I am aware of it," replied Mrs. Bloundel, "and nothing but consideration for my husband prevents my delivering him to justice. As it is, he may go free, but should he return" —

"If I catch him here again," said Leonard, "I will shoot him as I would a dog, though I should be hanged for the deed. Have you considered well what you are doing, madam? I would not presume beyond my station, but there are seasons when an inferior may give wholesome advice. Are you certain you are acting as your worthy husband would approve, in allowing this person to depart? If you have any doubt, speak. Fear nothing. Unarmed as I am, I am a match for him, and will detain him."

"Do not heed what Leonard says, dear mother," interposed Amabel. "For my sake let Mr. Wyvil go."

"I have considered the matter, Leonard," returned Mrs. Bloundel, "and trust I am acting rightly. At all events, I am sure I am sparing my husband pain."

"It is mistaken tenderness," rejoined Leonard, "and Heaven grant you may not have cause to repent it. If I had your permission, I would so deal with this audacious intruder, that he should never venture to repeat his visit."

"You know that you speak safely, fellow," rejoined Wyvil, "and you, therefore, give full licence to your scurril tongue. But a time will come when I will chastise your insolence."

"No more of this," cried Mrs. Bloundel. "Do as I bid you, Leonard, and as you value my regard, say nothing of what has occurred to your master."

Sullenly acquiescing, the apprentice preceded Wyvil to the shop, and opened the door.

As the other passed through it, he said, "You spoke of chastising me just now. If you have courage enough,—which I doubt,—to make good your words, and will wait for me for five minutes near Saint Alban's Church in this street, you shall have the opportunity."

Wyvil did not deign a reply, but wrapping his cloak around him, strode away. He had not proceeded far, when it occurred to him that, possibly, notwithstanding his interdiction, some of his companions might be waiting for him, and hurrying down the passage leading to the yard, he found Lydyard, to whom he recounted his ill-success.

"I shall not, however, abandon my design," he said. "These failures are only incentives to further exertion."

"In the mean time, you must pay your wager to Sedley," laughed Lydyard, "and as the house is really infected with the plague, it behoves you to call at the first apothecary's shop we find open, and get your apparel fumigated. You must not neglect due precautions."

"True," replied Wyvil, "and as I feel too restless to go home at present, suppose we amuse ourselves by calling on some astrologer, to see whether the stars are favourable to my pursuit of this girl."

"A good idea," replied Lydyard. "There are plenty of the 'Sons of Urania,' as they term themselves, hereabouts."

"A mere juggler will not serve my turn," returned Wyvil. "William Lilly, the almanack-maker, who predicted the plague, and who professes to have great skill in the occult sciences, lives somewhere in Friday-street, not a stone's throw from this place. Let us go and find him out."

"Agreed," replied Lydyard.

CHAPTER V.

THE POMANDER-BOX.

ANY doubts entertained by Leonard Holt as to the manner in which his rival entered the house, were removed by discovering the open window in the passage, and the rope-ladder hanging to the yard-wall. Taking the ladder away, and making all as secure as he could, he next seized his cudgel, and proceeded to Blaize's room, with the intention of inflicting upon him the punishment he had threatened; for he naturally enough attributed to the porter's carelessness all the mischief that just had occurred. Not meeting with him, however, and concluding he was in the kitchen, he descended thither, and found him in such a pitiable plight, that his wrath was instantly changed to compassion.

The porter was stretched upon the hearth, before a blazing sea-coal fire, which seemed large enough to roast him, with his head resting upon the lap of Patience, the pretty kitchen-maid, and his left hand upon his heart, loudly complaining of a fixed and burning pain in that quarter; while his mother, who was kneeling beside him, having just poured a basin of scalding posset-drink down his throat, entreated him to let her examine his side to see whether he had any pestilential mark upon it, but he vehemently resisted her efforts.

"Do you feel any swelling, myn lief zoon?" asked old Josyna, trying to remove his hand.

"Swelling!" ejaculated Blaize,—"there's a tumour as big as an egg."

"Is id possible?" exclaimed Josyna, in great alarm. "Do led me look ad id."

"No, no, leave me alone," rejoined Blaize. "Don't disturb me further. You will catch the distemper if you touch the sore."

"Dad wond hinder me from drying to zaave you," replied his mother, affectionately. "I musd see vad is de madder vid you, or I cannod cure you."

"I am past your doctoring, mother," groaned Blaize. "Leave me alone, I say. You hurt me shockingly!"

"Poor child," cried Josyna soothingly, "I'll be as dender as possible. I'll nod give you de leasd pain—nod de leasd bid."

"But I tell you you do give me a great deal," rejoined Blaize. "I can't bear it. Your fingers are like iron nails. Keep them away."

"Bless us, did I ever hear de like of dad!" exclaimed

Josyna. "Iron nailz! if you think so, myn arm zoon, you must be very ill, indeed."

"I am very ill," groaned her son. "I am not long for this world."

"Oh! don't say so, dear Blaize," sobbed Patience, letting fall a plentiful shower of tears on his face. "Don't say so. I can't bear to part with you."

"Then don't survive me," returned Blaize. "But there's little chance of your doing so. You are certain to take the plague."

"I care not what becomes of myself, if I lose you, Blaize," responded Patience, bedewing his countenance with another shower. "But I hope you won't die yet."

"Ah! it's all over with me,—all over," rejoined Blaize. "I told Leonard Holt how it would be. I said I should be the next victim; and my words have come true."

"You are as clever as a conjuror," sobbed Patience; "but I wish you hadn't been right in this instance. However, mfort yourself. I'll die with you. We'll be carried to the grave in the same plague-cart."

"That's cold comfort," returned Blaize, angrily. "I beg you'll never mention the plague-cart again. The thought of it makes me shiver all over—oh!" And he uttered a dismal and prolonged groan.

At this juncture, Leonard, who had been an unseen witness of what was passing, thought it time to interfere.

"If you are really attacked by the plague, Blaize," he said, advancing, "you must have instant advice. Doctor Hodges is still up stairs with our master. He must see you."

"On no account," returned the porter, in the greatest alarm, and springing to his feet. "I am better—much better. I don't think I am ill at all."

"For the first time, I suspect the contrary," replied the apprentice, "since you are afraid of owning it. But this is not a matter to be trifled with. Doctor Hodges will soon settle the point." And he hurried out of the room to summon the physician.

"Oh! mother—dear Patience!" roared Blaize, capering about in an ecstasy of terror, "don't let the doctor come near me. Keep me out of his sight. You don't know what horrid things are done to those afflicted with my complaint. But I do, for I have informed myself on the subject. Their skins are scari-fied ; and their sores blistered, lanced, cauterized, and sometimes burned away with a knob of red hot iron, called 'the button.'"

"Bud if'id is necessary, myn goed Blaize, you musd submid," replied his mother. "Never mind de hod iron, or de lance, or de blisder, if dey make you well. Never mind de pain. It will soon be over."

"Soon over !" bellowed Blaize, sinking into a chair. "Yes, I feel it will. But not in the way you imagine. This Doctor Hodges will kill me. He is fond of trying experiments, and will make me his subject. Don't let him,—for pity's sake, don't."

"Bud I musd, myn lief jonger," replied his mother, "I musd."

"Oh, Patience !" supplicated Blaize, "you were always fond of me. My mother has lost her natural affection. She wishes to get rid of me. Don't take part with her. My sole dependence is upon you."

"I will do all I can for you, dear Blaize," blubbered the kitchen-maid. "But it is absolutely necessary for you to see the doctor."

"Then I won't stay here another minute," vociferated Blaize. "I'll die in the street rather than under his hands."

And bursting from them, he would have made good his retreat, but for the entrance of Leonard and Hodges.

At the sight of the latter, Blaize ran back, and endeavoured to screen himself behind Patience.

"Is this the sick man ?" remarked Hodges, scarcely able to refrain from laughing, to Leonard. "I don't think he can be in such imminent danger, as you led me to suppose."

"No, I'm better—much better, thank you," returned Blaize, still keeping Patience between him and the doctor. "The very sight of you has frightened away the plague."

"Indeed !" exclaimed Hodges, smiling, "then it is the most marvellous cure I ever yet effected. But, come forward, young man, and let us see what is the matter with you ?"

"You neither lance, nor cauterize, an incipient tumour, do you, doctor ?" demanded Blaize, without abandoning his position.

"Eh, day !" exclaimed Hodges, "have we one of the faculty here ? I see how it is, friend. You have been reading about the disease, and have frightened yourself into the belief that you have some of its symptoms. I hope you haven't been doctoring yourself, likewise. What have you taken ?"

"It would be difficult to say what he has not taken," remarked Leonard. "His stomach must be like an apothecary's shop."

"I have only used proper precautions," rejoined Blaize, testily.

"And what may those be—eh ?" inquired the doctor. "I am curious to learn."

"Come from behind Patience," cried Leonard, and don't act the fool longer, or I will see whether your disorder will not yield to a sound application of the cudgel."

"Don't rate him thus, good Master Leonard," said Patience. "He is very ill—he is, indeed."

"Then let him have a chance of getting better," returned the apprentice. "If he is ill, he has no business near you. Come from behind her, Blaize, I say. Now speak," he added, as the porter crept tremblingly forth, "and let us hear what nostrums you have swallowed ? I know you have dosed yourself with pills, electuaries, balsams, tinctures, conserves, spirits, elixirs, decoctions, and every other remedy, real or imaginary. What else have you done ?"

"What Doctor Hodges, I am sure, will approve," replied Blaize, confidently. "I have rubbed myself with vinegar, oil of sulphur, extract of tar, and spirit of turpentine."

"What next ?" demanded Hodges.

"I placed saltpetre, brimstone, amber, and juniper upon a chafing-dish to fumigate my room," replied Blaize, "but the vapour was so overpowering I could not bear it."

"I should be surprised if you could," replied the doctor. "Indeed, it is astonishing to me, if you have taken half the remedies you mention,—and which, taken in this way, are no remedies at all, since they counteract each other,—that you are still alive. But let us see what is the matter with you. What ails you particularly ?"

"Nothing," replied Blaize, trembling. "I am quite well."

"He complains of a fixed pain near de haard, doctor," interposed his mother, "and says he has a large dumour on his side, bud he won'd led me examine id."

"That's a bad sign," observed Hodges, shaking his head. "I am afraid it's not all fancy, as I at first supposed. Have you felt sick of late, young man ?"

"Not of late," replied Blaize, becoming as white as ashes ; "but I do now."

"Another bad symptom," rejoined the doctor. "Take off your doublet, and open your shirt."

"Do as the doctor bids you," said Leonard, seeing that Blaize hesitated, "or I apply the cudgel."

"Ah ! bless my life ! what's this ?" cried Hodges, running his hand down the left side of the porter, and meeting with a large lump. "Can it be a carbuncle ?"

"Yes, it's a terrible carbuncle," replied Blaize ; "but don't cauterise it, doctor."

"Let me look at it," cried Hodges, "and I shall then know how to proceed."

And as he spoke, he tore open the porter's shirt, and a silver ball, about as large as a pigeon's egg, fell to the ground. Leonard picked it up, and found it so hot that he could scarcely hold it.

"Here is the terrible carbuncle," he cried, with a laugh, in which all the party, except Blaize, joined.

"It's my pomander-box," said the porter. "I filled it with a mixture of citron-peel, angelica-seed, ze-doary, yellow-saunders, aloes, benzoin, camphor, and gum-tragacanth, moistened with spirit of roses; and after placing it on the chafing-dish to heat it, hung it by a string round my neck, next my dried toad. I suppose, by some means or other, it dropped through my doublet, and found its way to my side. I felt a dreadful burning there, and that made me fancy I was attacked by the plague."

"A very satisfactory solution of the mystery," replied the doctor, laughing, "and you may think yourself well off with the blister which your box has raised. It will be easier to bear than the cataplasm I should have given you, had your apprehensions been well-founded. As yet, you are free from infection, young man. But if you persist in this silly and pernicious practice of quacking yourself, you will infallibly bring on some fatal disorder,—perhaps the plague itself. If your mother has any regard for you, she will put all your medicines out of your reach. There are few known remedies against this frightful disease, and what few there are must be adopted cautiously. My own specific is sack."

"Sack!" exclaimed Blaize, in astonishment. "Henceforth, I will drink nothing else. I like the remedy amazingly."

"It must be taken in moderation," said the doctor. "Otherwise, it is as dangerous as too much physic."

"I have a boddle or doo of de liquor you commend, doctor, in my private cupboard," observed Josyna. "Will you dasde id?"

"With great pleasure," replied Hodges, "and a drop of it will do your son no harm."

The wine was accordingly produced, and the doctor pronounced it excellent, and desired that a glass might always be brought him, when he visited the grocer's house.

"You may rely upon id, mynheer, as long as my small store lasts," replied Josyna.

Blaize, who, in obedience to the doctor's commands, had drained a large glass of sack, felt so much inspirited by it, that he ventured, when his mother's back was turned, to steal a kiss from Patience, and to whisper in her ear, that if they escaped the plague he would certainly marry her,—an assurance that seemed to give her no slight satisfaction. His new-born courage, however, was, in some degree, damped by Leonard, who observed to him in an under tone, "You have neglected my injunctions, sirrah, and allowed the person I warned you of to enter the house. When a fitting season arrives, I will not fail to pay off old scores."

Blaize would have remonstrated, and asked for some explanation, but the apprentice instantly left him, and set out upon his errand to the Examiner of Health. Accompanied by his mother, who would not even allow him to say good night to Patience, the porter then proceeded to his own room, where the old woman, to his infinite regret, carried off his stores of medicine in a basket which she brought with her for that purpose and locked the door upon him.

"This has escaped her," said Blaize, as soon as she was gone, opening a secret drawer in the cupboard. "How fortunate it was, that I kept this reserve. I have still a tolerable supply, in case of need. Let me examine my stock. First of all, there are plague-lozenges, composed of angelica, liquorice, flour of sulphur, myrrh, and oil of cinnamon. Secondly, an electuary of bole-armoniac, hartshorn-shavings, saffron, and syrup of wood-sorrel. I long to taste it. But then, it would be running in the doctor's teeth. Thirdly, there is a phial, labelled Aqua Theriacalis Stillatitia,—in plain English, distilled treacle-water. A spoonful of this couldn't hurt me. Fourthly, a packet of powders, entitled Manus Christi—an excellent mixture. Fifthly, a small pot of diatesseron, composed of gentian, myrrh, bayberries, and round aristolochia. I must just taste it. Never mind the doctor!—he does not know what agrees with my constitution so well as I do myself. Physic comes as naturally to me as mother's milk. Sixthly, there is Aqua Epidemica, commonly called the Plague-Water of Matthias—delicious stuff!—I will only just sip it. What a fine bitter it has! I'm sure it must be very wholesome. Next, for I've lost my count, comes salt of vipers,—next, powder of unicorn's horn,—next, oil of scorpions from Naples,—next, dragon water,—all admirable. Then there are cloves of garlic,—sovereign fortifiers of the stomach,—and, lastly, there is a large box of my favourite rufuses. How many pills have I taken? Only half-a-dozen! Three more may as well go to keep the others company."

And hastily swallowing them, as if afraid of detection, he carefully shut the drawer, and then crept into bed, and, covering himself with blankets, endeavoured to compose himself to slumber.

Doctor Hodges, meantime, returned to the grocer and acquainted him that it was a false alarm, and that the porter was entirely free from infection.

"I am glad to hear it," replied Bloundel, "but I suspected as much. Blaize is like the shepherd's boy in the fable,—he has cried 'wolf' so often, that when the danger really arrives, no one will regard him."

"I must now take my leave, Mr. Bloundel," said Hodges. "I will be with you the first thing to-morrow, and have little doubt I shall find your son going on well. But you must not merely take care of him, but of yourself, and your household. It will be well to set a chafing-dish in the middle of the room, and scatter some of these perfumes occasionally upon it," and producing several small packets, he gave them to the grocer. "If you ever smoke a pipe, I would advise you to do so now."

"I never do smoke," replied Bloundel, "and hold it a filthy and mischievous habit, which nothing but necessity should induce me to practise."

"It is advisable now," returned Hodges, "and you should neglect no precaution. Take my word for it, Mr. Bloundel, the plague is only beginning. When the heats of summer arrive, its ravages will be frightful. Heaven only knows what will become of us all!"

"If my poor son is spared, and we escape contagion," returned Bloundel, "I will put into execution a scheme, which has occurred to me, and which (under God's providence!) will, I trust, secure my family from further hazard."

"Ah, indeed! what is that?" inquired Hodges.

"We must talk of it some other time," returned Bloundel. "Good night, doctor, and accept my thanks for your attention. To-morrow, at as early an hour as you can make convenient, I shall hope to see you." And with a friendly shake of the hand, and a reiteration of advice and good wishes, Hodges departed.

Soon after this, the apprentice returned, and by his master's directions placed a chafing-dish in the middle of the room, supplying it with the drugs and herbs left by the doctor. About four o'clock, a loud knocking was heard. Instantly answering the summons, Leonard found four men at the shop-door, two of whom he knew, by red wands they carried, were searchers, while their companions appeared to be undertakers, from their sable habits and long black cloaks.

Marching unceremoniously into the shop, the searchers desired to see the sick man; and the apprentice then perceived that one of the men in black cloaks was the coffin-maker, Chowles. He could not, however, refuse him admittance, and led the way to the grocer's chamber. As they entered it, Bloundel arose, and placing his finger to his lips in token of silence, raised the blankets, and exhibited the blotch, which had greatly increased in size, under the arm of his slumbering son. The foremost of the searchers, who kept a phial of vinegar to his nose all the time he remained in the room, then demanded in a low tone whether there were any other of the household infected? The grocer replied in the negative. Upon this, Chowles, whose manner showed he was more than half-intoxicated, took off his hat, and bowing obsequiously to the grocer, said, "Shall I prepare you a coffin, Mr. Bloundel? You are sure to want one, and had better give the order in time, for there is a great demand for such articles just now. If you like, I will call with it to-morrow night. I have a plague-cart of my own, and bury all my customers."

"God grant I may not require your services, sir!" replied the grocer, shuddering. "But I will give you timely notice."

"If you are in want of a nurse, I can recommend an experienced one," added Chowles. "Her last employer is just dead."

"I may need assistance," replied the grocer, after a moment's reflection. "Let her call to-morrow."

"She understands her business perfectly, and will save you a world of trouble," replied Chowles,— "besides securing me the sale of another coffin," he added to himself.

He then quitted the room with the searchers, and Leonard felt inexpressibly relieved by their departure.

As soon as the party gained the street, the fourth person, who was provided with materials for the task, painted a red cross, of the prescribed size,—namely, a foot's length—in the middle of the door; tracing above it, in large characters, the melancholy formula—

LORD HAVE MERCY UPON US!

CHAPTER VI.

THE LIBERTINE PUNISHED.

SIR PAUL PARRAVICIN and Major Pillichody arrived without any particular adventure at the top of the Haymarket, where the former dismissed the coach he had hired in Cheapside, and they proceeded towards Piccadilly on foot. Up to this time, the Major had been in very high spirits, boasting what he would do, in case they encountered Disbrowe, and offering to keep guard outside the door while the Knight remained in the house. But he now began to alter his tone, and to frame excuses to get away. He had noticed with some uneasiness that another coach stopped lower down in the Haymarket, at precisely the same time as their own; and though he could not be quite certain of the fact, he fancied he perceived a person, greatly resembling Captain Disbrowe, alight from it. Mentioning the circumstance to his companion, he pointed out a tall figure following them at some distance; but the other only laughed at him, and said, "It may possibly be Disbrowe—but what if it is? He cannot get into the house without the key; and if he is inclined to measure swords with me a second time, he shall not escape so lightly as he did the first."

"Right, Sir Paul, right," returned Pillichody, "exterminate him—spare him not. By Bellerophon! that's my way. My only apprehension is lest he should set upon us unawares. The bravest are not proof against the dagger of an assassin."

"There you wrong Disbrowe, Major, I am persuaded," returned Parravicin. "He is too much a man of honour to stab a foe behind his back."

"It may be," replied Pillichody, "but jealousy will sometimes turn a man's brain. By the snakes of Tisiphone! I have known an instance of it myself. I once made love to a tailor's wife, and the rascal coming in unawares, struck me to the ground with his goose, and well nigh murdered me."

"After such a mischance, I am surprised you should venture to carry on so many hazardous intrigues," laughed the Knight. "But you proposed just now to keep watch outside the house. If it is Disbrowe who is following us, you had better do so."

"Why, Sir Paul—you see"—stammered the Major, "I have just bethought me of an engagement."

"An engagement at this hour—impossible!" cried Parravicin.

"An assignation, I ought to say," returned Pil-lichody. "Couches of Cytheræa!—an affair like your own. You would not have me keep a lady waiting."

"It is strange you should not recollect it till this moment," replied Parravicin. "But be your innamorata whom she may—even the rich widow of Watling-street, of whom you prate so much,—you must put her off to-night."

"But, Sir Paul—"

"I will have no denial," replied the Knight, peremptorily. "If you refuse, you will find me worse to deal with than Disbrowe. You must remain at the door till I come out. And now let us lose no more time. I am impatient to behold the lady."

"Into what a cursed scrape have I got myself!" thought the Major, as he walked by the side of his companion, ever and anon casting wistful glances over his shoulder, "I am fairly caught on the horns of a dilemma. I instinctively feel that Disbrowe is dogging us. What will become of me? The moment this hairbrained coxcomb enters the house, I will see whether a light pair of heels cannot bear me out of harm's way."

By this time, they had reached a passage known as Bear-alley (all traces of which have been swept away by modern improvements), and threading it, they entered a narrow thoroughfare, called Castle-street. Just as they turned the corner, Pillichody again noticed the figure at the further end of the alley, and, but for his fears of the Knight, would have instantly scampered off.

"Are we far from the house?" inquired Parravicin.

"No," replied the Major, scarcely able to conceal his trepidation. "It is close at hand,—and so is the lady's husband."

"So much the better," replied the Knight; "it will afford you some amusement to beat him off. You may affect not to know him, and may tell him the lady's husband is just come home—her husband!—do you take, Pillichody?"

"I do—ha! ha! I do," replied the Major, in a quivering tone.

"But you don't appear to relish the jest," rejoined Parravicin, sneeringly.

"Oh, yes, I relish it exceedingly," replied Pillichody—"her husband—ha!—ha!—and Disbrowe is the disappointed lover—capital! But here we are—and I wish we were anywhere else,” he added to himself.

“Are you sure you are right?” asked Parravicin, searching for the key.

“Quite sure,” returned Pillichody. “Don’t you see some one behind that wall?”

“I see nothing,” rejoined the Knight. “You are afraid of shadows, Major.”

“Afraid!” ejaculated Pillichody. “Thousand thunders! I am afraid of nothing.”

“In that case, I shall expect to find you have slain Disbrowe on my return,” rejoined Parravicin, unlocking the door.

“The night is chilly,” observed the Major, “and ever since my campaigns in the Low Countries, I have been troubled with rheumatism. I should prefer keeping guard inside.”

“No,—no,—you must remain where you are,” replied the Knight, shutting the door.

Pillichody was about to take to his heels, when he felt himself arrested by a powerful arm. He would have roared for aid, but a voice, which he instantly recognized, commanded him to keep silence, if he valued his life.

“Is your companion in the house?” demanded Disbrowe, in a hollow tone.

“I am sorry to say he is, Captain Disbrowe,” replied the bully. “I did my best to prevent him, but remonstrance was in vain.”

“Liar!” cried Disbrowe, striking him with his clenched hand. “Do you think to impose upon me by such a pitiful fabrication? It was you who introduced me to this heartless libertine,—you who encouraged me to play with him, telling me I should easily strip him of all he possessed,—you who excited his passion for my wife by praising her beauty,—and it was you who put it into his head to propose that fatal stake to me.”

“There you are wrong, Captain Disbrowe,” returned Pillichody in a supplicatory tone. “On my soul, you are! I certainly praised your wife (as who would not?), but I never advised Parravicin to play for her. That was his own idea entirely.”

“The excuse shall not avail you,” cried Disbrowe, fiercely. “To you I owe all my misery. Draw and defend yourself.”

“Be not so hasty, Captain,” cried Pillichody, abjectly. “I have injured you sufficiently already. I would not have your blood on my head. On the honour of a soldier, I am sorry for the wrong I have done you, and will strive to repair it.”

“Repair it!” shrieked Disbrowe. “It is too late.” And, seizing the Major’s arm, he dragged him by main force into the alley.

“Help!—help!” reared Pillichody, “Would you murder me?”

“I will assuredly cut your throat, if you keep up this clamour,” rejoined Disbrowe, snatching the other’s long rapier from his side. “Coward!” he added, striking him with the flat side of the weapon, “this will teach you to mix yourself up in such infamous affairs for the future.”

And heedless of the Major’s entreaties and vociferations, he continued to belabour him, until compelled by fatigue to desist; when the other, contriving to extricate himself, ran off as fast as his legs could carry him. Disbrowe looked after him for a moment, as if uncertain whether to follow, and then hurrying to the house, stationed himself beneath the porch.

“I will stab him as he comes forth,” he muttered, drawing his sword, and hiding it beneath his mantle.

Parravicin, meanwhile, having let himself into the house, marched boldly forward, though the passage was buried in darkness, and he was utterly unacquainted with it. Feeling against the wall, he presently discovered a door, and opening it, entered a room, lighted by a small silver lamp, placed on a marble slab. The room was empty, but its furniture and arrangements proclaimed it the favourite retreat of the fair mistress of the abode. Parravicin gazed curiously round, as if anxious to gather from what he saw some idea of the person he so soon expected to encounter. Every thing betokened a refined and luxurious taste. A few French romances, the last plays of Etherege, Dryden, and Shadwell, a volume of Cowley, and some amorous songs, lay on the table; and not far from them were a leo-mask, a pulvil purse, a pair of scented gloves, a richly-laced mouchoir, a manteau girdle, palatine tags, and a golden bodkin for the hair.

Examining all these things, and drawing his own conclusions as to the character of their owner, Parravicin turned to a couch on which a cittern was thrown, while beside it, on a cushion, were a pair of tiny, embroidered, velvet slippers. A pocket-mirror, or sprunking-glass, as it was then termed, lay on a side table, and near it stood an embossed silver chocolate pot, and a small porcelain cup with a golden spoon inside it, showing what the lady’s last repast had been. On another small table, covered with an exquisitely-white napkin, stood a flask of wine, a tall-stemmed glass, and a few cates on a China dish, evidently placed there for Disbrowe’s return.

As Parravicin drew near this table, a slip of paper, with a few lines traced upon it, attracted his attention, and taking it up, he read as follows:—

“It is now midnight, and you promised to return early. I have felt your absence severely, and have been suffering from a violent headache, which has almost distracted me. I have, also, been troubled with strange and unaccountable misgivings respecting you. I am a little easier now, but still far from well, and about to retire to rest. At what hour will this meet your eye?”

“MARGARET.”

“Charming creature!” exclaimed Parravicin, as the paper dropped from his hand; "she little dreamed, when she wrote it, who would read her billet. Disbrowe does not deserve such a treasure. I am sorry she is unwell. I hope she has not taken the plague. Pshaw! what could put such an idea into my head? Lydyard's warning, I suppose. That fellow, who is the veriest rake among us, is always preaching. Confound him! I wish he had not mentioned it. A glass of wine may exhilarate me." And pouring out a bumper, he swallowed it at a draught. "And so the fond fool is pining for her husband, and has some misgivings about him. Egad! it is well for her she does not know what has really taken place. She'll learn that soon enough. What's this?" he added, glancing at a picture on the wall. "Her miniature! It must be,—for it answers exactly to Pillichody's description. A sparkling brunette, with raven hair, and eyes of night. I am on fire to behold her. But I must proceed with prudence, or I may ruin all. Is there nothing of Disbrowe's that I could put on for the nonce? 'Fore heaven! the very thing I want."

The exclamation was occasioned by his observing a loose silken robe lying across a chair. Wrapping it round him, and throwing down his hat, he took the lamp, and went up stairs.

Daring as he was, Parravicin felt his courage desert him, as having found the door of Mrs. Disbrowe's chamber, he cautiously opened it. A single glance showed him that the room was more exquisitely,—more luxuriously, furnished than that he had just quitted. Articles of feminine attire of the richest kind were hung against the walls, or disposed on the chairs. On one side stood the toilette table, with its small mirror—then in vogue—and all its equipage of silver flasks, filligree caskets, japan patch-boxes, scent bottles, and pomatum-pots.

As he entered the room, a faint voice issuing from behind the rich damask curtains of the bed, demanded, "Is it you, Disbrowe?"

"It is, Margaret," replied Parravicin, setting down the lamp, and speaking with a handkerchief at his mouth to disguise his voice.

"You are late—very late," she rejoined, "and I have been ill. I fancied myself dying."

"What has been the matter with you, sweet Meg?" asked Parravicin, approaching the bed, and seating himself behind the curtains.

"I know not," she replied. "I was seized with a dreadful headache about an hour ago. It has left me, but I have a strange oppression at my chest, and breathe with difficulty."

"You alarm me, my love," rejoined Parravicin. "Were you ever attacked thus before?"

"Never," she replied. "Oh, Disbrowe! if you knew how I have longed for your return, you would blame yourself for your absence. You have grown sadly neglectful of late. I suspect you love some one else. If I thought so —."

"What if you thought so, Margaret?" demanded Parravicin.

"What!" cried Mrs. Disbrowe, raising herself in the bed. "I would requite your perfidy,—terribly requite it."

"Then learn that Captain Disbrowe is faithless," cried Parravicin, throwing back the curtains, and disclosing himself. "Learn, that he loves another, and is with her now. Learn, that he cares so little for you that he has surrendered you to me."

"What do I hear?" exclaimed Mrs. Disbrowe. "Who are you—and what brings you here?"

"You may guess my errand from my presence," replied the Knight. "I am called Sir Paul Parravicin, and am the most devoted of your admirers."

"My husband surrender me to a stranger!—it cannot be!" cried the lady, distractedly.

"You see me here, and may judge of the truth of my statement," rejoined the Knight. "Your husband gave me this key, with which I introduced myself to the house."

"What motive could he have for such unheard-of baseness—such barbarity?" cried Mrs. Disbrowe, bursting into tears.

"Shall I tell you, madam?" replied Parravicin. "He is tired of you, and has taken this means to rid himself of you."

Mrs. Disbrowe made no reply, but uttering a loud scream, fell back in the bed. Parravicin waited for a moment, but not hearing her move, brought the lamp, to see what was the matter. She had fainted, and was lying across the pillow, with her night-dress partly open, so as to expose her neck and shoulders.

The Knight was at first ravished with her beauty, but his countenance suddenly fell, and an expression of horror and alarm took possession of it. He appeared rooted to the spot, and instead of attempting to render her any assistance, remained with his gaze fixed upon her neck.

Rousing himself at length, he rushed out of the room, hurried down stairs, and without pausing for a moment, threw open the street-door. As he issued from it, his throat was forcibly gripped, and the point of a sword was placed at his breast.

"You are now in my power, villain," cried Disbrowe, "and shall not escape my vengeance."

"You are already avenged," replied Parravicin, shaking off his assailant. "Your wife has the plague."

CHAPTER VII.

THE PLAGUE NURSE.

"AND so my husband has got the plague," muttered Mother Malmayns as she hastened towards Saint Paul's, after the reproof she had received from Doctor Hodges. "Well, it's a disorder that few recover from, and I don't think he stands a better chance than his fellows. I've been troubled with him long enough. I've borne his ill-usage and savage temper for twenty years, vainly hoping something would take him off; but though he tried his constitution hard, it was too tough to yield. However, he's likely to go now. If I find him better than I expect, I can easily make all sure. That's one good thing about the plague. You may get rid of a patient without any one being the wiser. A wrong mixture—a pillow removed—a moment's chill during the fever—a glass of cold water—the slightest thing will do it. Matthew Malmayns, you will die of the plague, that's certain. But I must be careful how I proceed. That cursed doctor has his eye upon me. As luck would have it, I've got Sibbald's ointment in my pocket. That is sure to do its business,—and safely."

Thus ruminating, she shaped her course towards the south-west corner of the cathedral, and passing under the shrouds and cloisters near the Convocation House, raised the latch of a small wooden shed fixed in the angle of a buttress. Evidently well acquainted with the place, she was not long in finding a lantern, and materials to light it, and inserting her fingers in a crevice of the masonry from which the mortar had been removed, she drew forth a key.

"It has not been stirred since I left it here a month ago," she muttered. "I must take care of this key, for if Matthew should die, I may not be able to enter the vaults of Saint Faith's without it: and as I know all their secret places and passages, which nobody else does, except my husband, I can make them a storehouse for the plunder I may obtain during the pestilence. If it rages for a year, or only half that time, and increases in violence (as God grant it may!), I will fill every hole in those walls with gold."

With this, she took up the lantern, and crept along the side of the cathedral, until she came to a flight of stone steps. Descending them, she unlocked a small but strong door, cased with iron, and fastening it after her, proceeded along a narrow stone passage, which brought her to another door opening upon the south aisle of Saint Faith's.

Pausing for a moment to listen whether any one was within the sacred structure, for such was the dead and awful silence of the place that the slightest whisper or footfall, even at its farthest extremity, could be distinguished, she crossed to the other side, glancing fearfully around her as she threaded the ranks of pillars, whose heavy and embrowned shafts her lantern feebly illumined, and entering a recess, took a small stone out of the wall, and deposited the chief part of the contents of her pocket behind it, after which she carefully replaced the stone. This done, she hurried to the charnel, and softly opened the door of the crypt.

Greatly relieved by the operation he had undergone, the sexton had sunk into a slumber, and was, therefore, unconscious of the entrance of his wife, who, setting down the lantern, advanced towards the pallet. His mother and the young man were still in attendance, and the former on seeing her daughter-in-law, exclaimed in low but angry accents,—“What brings you here, Judith? I suppose you expected to find my son dead. But he will disappoint you. Doctor Hodges said he would recover—did he not, Reynold?” she added, appealing to the young man, who nodded acquiescence. “He will recover I tell you.”

“Well, well,” replied Judith, in the blandest tones she could assume,—“I hope he will; and if the doctor says so, I have no doubt of it. I only heard of his illness a few minutes ago, and came instantly to nurse him.”

“You nurse him!” cried the old woman,—“if you show him any affection now, it will be for the first time since your wedding-day.”

“How long has he been unwell?” demanded Judith, with difficulty repressing her anger.

“He was seized the night before last,” replied the old woman,—“but he didn't know what was the matter with him when it began. I saw him just before he went to rest, and he complained of a slight illness, but nothing to signify. He must have passed a frightful night, for the vergers found him in the morning running about Saint Faith's, like a madman, and dashing his spades and mattocks against the walls and pillars. They secured him, and brought him here, and on examination he proved to have the plague.”

“You surprise me by what you say,” replied Judith. “During the last month, I have nursed more than a dozen patients, and never knew any of them so violent. I must look at his sore."

The doctor has just dressed it," observed the old woman.

"I don't mind that," rejoined Judith, turning down the blanket, and examining her husband's shoulder. "You are right," she added, "he is doing as well as possible."

"I suppose I shan't be wanted any more," observed the young man, "now you're come back to nurse your husband, Mrs. Malmayns. I shall be glad to get home to my own bed, for I don't feel well at all."

"Don't alarm yourself," rejoined Judith. "There's a bottle of plague-vinegar for you. Dip a piece of linen in it, and smell at it, and I'll insure you against the pestilence."

The young man took the phial, and departed. But the remedy was of little avail. Before daybreak, he was seized with the distemper, and died two days afterwards.

"I hope poor Reynold hasn't got the plague?" said the old woman, in a tremulous tone.

"I am afraid he has," replied her daughter-in-law, "but I didn't like to alarm him."

"Mercy on us!" cried the other, getting up. "What a dreadful scourge it is."

"You would say so, if you had seen whole families swept off by it as I have," replied Judith. "But it mostly attacks old persons and children."

"Lord help us!" cried the crone. "I hope it will spare me. I thought my age secured me."

"Quite the reverse," replied Judith, desirous of exciting her mother-in-law's terrors,—“quite the reverse. You must take care of yourself."

"But you don't think I'm ill, do you?" asked the other, anxiously.

"Sit down, and let me look at you," said Judith.

And the old woman tremblingly obeyed.

"Well, what do you think of me—what's the matter?" she asked, as her daughter-in-law eyed her for some minutes in silence. "What's the matter I say?"

But Judith remained silent.

"I insist upon knowing," continued the old woman.

"Are you able to bear the truth?" returned her daughter-in-law.

"You need say no more," groaned the old woman. "I know what the truth is, and will try to bear it. I will get home as fast as I can, and put my few affairs in order, so that if I am carried off, I may not go unprepared."

"You had better do so," replied her daughter-in-law.

"You will take care of my poor son, Judith," rejoined the old woman, shedding a flood of tears. "I would stay with him, if I thought I could do him any good, but if I really am infected, I might only be in the way. Don't neglect him—as you hope for mercy hereafter, do not."

"Make yourself easy, mother," replied Judith. "I will take every care of him."

"Have you no fears of the disorder yourself?" inquired the old woman.

"None whatever," replied Judith. "I am a safe woman."

"I do not understand you," replied her mother-in-law, in surprise.

"I have had the plague," replied Judith; "and those who have had it once, never take it a second time."

This opinion, entertained at the commencement of the pestilence, it may be incidentally remarked, was afterwards found to be entirely erroneous;—some being known to have the distemper three or four times.

"You never let us know you were ill," said the old woman.

"I could not do so," replied Judith; "and I don't know that I should have done, if I could. I was nursing two sisters at a small house in Clerkenwell-close, and they both died in the night-time within a few hours of each other. The next day, as I was preparing to leave the house, I was seized myself, and had scarcely strength to creep up stairs to bed. An old apothecary, named Sibbald, who had brought drugs to the house, attended me, and saved my life. In less than a week, I was well again, and able to move about, and should have returned home, but the apothecary told me, as I had had the distemper once, I might resume my occupation with safety. I did so, and have found plenty of employment."

"No doubt," rejoined the old woman; "and you will find plenty more—plenty more."

"I hope so," replied the other.

"Oh! do not give utterance to such a wicked wish, Judith," rejoined her mother-in-law. "Do not let curiosity steel your heart to every better feeling."

A slight derisive smile passed over the harsh features of the plague-nurse.

"You heed me not," pursued the old woman. "But a time will come when you will recollect my words."

"I am content to wait till then," rejoined Judith.

"Heaven grant you a better frame of mind!" exclaimed the old woman. "I must take one last look of my son, for it is not likely I shall see him again."

"Not in this world," thought Judith.

"I conjure you, by all that is sacred, not to neglect him," said the old woman.

"I have already promised to do so," replied Judith, impatiently. "Good night, mother."

"It will be a long good night to me, I fear," returned the dame. "Doctor Hedges promised to send some blankets and medicines for poor Matthew. The doctor is a charitable man to the poor, and if he learns I am sick, he may, perhaps, call, and give me advice."

"I am sure he will," replied Judith. "Should the man bring the blankets, I will tell him to acquaint his master with your condition. And now, take this lantern, mother, and get home as fast as you can."

So saying, she almost pushed her out of the vault, and closed the door after her.

"At last, I am rid of her," she muttered. "She would have been a spy over me. I hope I have frightened her into the plague. But if she dies of fear, it will answer my purpose as well. And now for my husband."

Taking up the lamp, and shading it with her hand, she gazed at his ghastly countenance.

"He slumbers tranquilly," she muttered, after contemplating him for some time, adding, with a chuckling laugh, "it would be a pity to waken him."

And seating herself on a stool near the pallet, she turned over in her mind in what way she could best execute her diabolical purpose.

While she was thus occupied, the messenger from Doctor Hodges arrived with a bundle of blankets, and several phials and pots of ointment. The man offered to place the blankets on the pallet, but Judith would not let him.

"I can do it better myself, and without disturbing the poor sufferer," she said. "Give my dutiful thanks to your master. Tell him my husband's mother, old widow Malmayns, fancies herself attacked by the plague, and if he will be kind enough to visit her, she lodges in the upper attic of a baker's house, at the sign of the Wheatsheaf, in Little Distaff-lane, hard by."

"I will not fail to deliver your message to the doctor," replied the man, as he took his departure.

Left alone with her husband a second time, Judith waited till she thought the man had got out of the cathedral, and then rising, and taking the lamp, she repaired to the charnel, to make sure it was untenanted. Not content with this, she stole out into Saint Faith's, and gazing round as far as the feeble light of her lamp would permit, called out, in a tone that even startled herself, "Is any one lurking there?" But receiving no other answer than was afforded by the deep echoes of the place, she returned to the vault. Just as she reached the door, a loud cry burst upon her ear, and rushing forward, she found that her husband had wakened.

"Ah!" roared Malmayns, raising himself in bed, as he perceived her. "Are you come back again, you she-devil? Where is my mother? Where is Reynold? What have you done with them?"

"They have both got the plague," replied his wife. "They caught it from you. But never mind them. I will watch over you as long as you live."

"And that will be for years, you accursed jade," replied the sexton. "Doctor Hodges says I shall recover."

"You have got worse since he left you," replied Judith. "Lie down, and let me throw these blankets over you."

"Off!" cried the sick man, furiously. "You shall not approach me. You want to smother me."

"I want to cure you," replied his wife, heaping the blankets upon the pallet. "The doctor has sent some ointment for your sore."

"Then let him apply it himself," cried Malmayns, shaking his fist at her. "You shall not touch me. I will strangle you, if you come near me."

"Matthew," replied his wife, "I have had the plague myself, and know how to treat it better than any doctor in London. I will cure you, if you will let me."

"I have no faith in you," replied Malmayns, "but I suppose I must submit. Take heed what you do to me, for if I have but five minutes to live, it will be long enough to revenge myself upon you."

"I will anoint your sore with this salve," rejoined Judith, producing a pot of dark-coloured ointment, and rubbing his shoulder with it. "It was given me by Sibbald, the apothecary of Clerkenwell. He is a friend of Chowles, the coffin-maker. You know Chowles, Matthew."

"I know him for as great a rascal as ever breathed," replied her husband, gruffly. "He has always cheated me out of my dues, and his coffins are the worst I ever put under ground."

"He is making his fortune now," said Judith.

"By the plague, eh?" replied Matthew. "I don't envy him. Money so gained won't stick to him. He will never prosper."

"I wish you had his money, Matthew," replied his wife, in a coaxing tone.

"If the plague hadn't attacked me when it did, I should have been richer than Chowles will ever be," replied the sexton. "Nay, I am richer as it is."

"You surprise me," replied Judith, suddenly pausing in her task. "How have you obtained your wealth?"

"I have discovered a treasure," replied the sexton, with a mocking laugh,— "a secret hoard—a chest of gold—ha! ha!"

"Where?—where?" demanded his wife, eagerly.

"That's a secret," replied Matthew.

"I must have it from him before he dies," thought his wife. "Had we not better secure it without delay?" she added, aloud. "Some other person may find it."

"Oh, it's safe enough," replied Matthew. "It has remained undiscovered for more than a hundred years, and will continue so for a hundred to come, unless I bring it forth."

"But you will bring it forth, won't you?" said Judith.

"Undoubtedly," replied Matthew,— "if I get better. But not otherwise. Money would be of no use to me in the grave?"

"But it would be of use to me," replied his wife.

"Perhaps it might," replied the sexton, "but if I die, the knowledge of the treasure shall die with me."

"He is deceiving me," thought Judith, beginning to rub his shoulder afresh.

"I suspect you have played me false, you jade," cried Malmayns, writhing with pain. "The stuff you have applied burns like caustic, and eats into my flesh."

"It is doing its duty," replied his wife, calmly watching his agonies. "You will soon be easier."

"Perhaps I shall,—in death," groaned the sufferer, "I am parched with thirst. Give me a glass of water."

"You shall have wine, Matthew, if you prefer it,—I have a flask in my pocket," she replied. "But what of the treasure,—where is it?"

"Peace!" he cried,—"I will baulk your avaricious hopes. You shall never know where it is."

"I shall know as much as you do," she rejoined, in a tone of incredulity. "I don't believe a word you have told me. You have found no treasure."

"If this is the last word I shall ever utter, I have," he returned,—"a mighty treasure. But you shall never possess it. Never,—ha! ha!"

"Nor shall you have the wine," she replied—"there is water for you," she added, handing him a jug, which he drained with frantic eagerness. "He is a dead man," she muttered.

"I am chilled to the heart," gasped the sexton, shivering from head to foot, while thick damps gathered on his brow. "I have done wrong in drinking the water, and you ought not to have given it me."

"You asked for it," she replied. "You should have had wine, but for your obstinacy. But I will save you yet, if you will tell me where to find the treasure."

"Look for it in my grave," he returned, with a hideous grin, "for there it will lie."

Soon after this, he fell into a sort of stupor. His wife could now have easily put a period to his existence, but she still hoped to wrest the secret from him. She was assured, moreover, that his recovery was hopeless. At the expiration of about two hours, he was aroused by the excruciating anguish of his sore. He had again become delirious, and raved as before about coffins, corpses, graves, and other loathsome matters. Seeing, from his altered looks, and the livid and gangrenous appearance which the tumour had assumed, that his end was not far off, Judith resolved not to lose a moment, but to try the effect of a sudden surprise. Accordingly, she bent down her head, and shouted in his ear, "What has become of your treasure, Matthew?"

The plan succeeded to a miracle. The dying man instantly raised himself.

"My treasure!" he echoed, with a yell that made the vault ring again. "Well thought on! I have never secured it. They are carrying it off. I must prevent them." And, throwing off the coverings, he sprang out of bed.

"I shall have it now," thought his wife. "You are right," she added, "they are carrying it off. The vergers have discovered it. They are digging it up. We must instantly prevent them."

"We must," shrieked Malmayns. "Bring the light! bring the light!" And bursting open the door he rushed into the adjoining aisle.

"He will kill himself, and discover the treasure into the bargain," cried Judith, following him. "Ah! what do I see! People in the church. Curses on them! They have ruined my hopes."

CHAPTER VIII.

THE MOSAICAL ROD.

IN pursuance of their design of seeking out an astrologer, Maurice Wyvil and Lydyard crossed Cheapside, and entered Friday-street. They had not proceeded far, when they perceived a watchman standing beneath a porch with a lantern in his hand, and thinking it an intimation that the house was attacked by the plague, they hurried to the opposite side of the street, and called to the watchman to inquire whether he knew where Mr. Lilly lived?

Ascertaining that the house they sought was only a short distance off, they repaired thither, and knocking at the door, a small hatch, protected by a grating, was opened within it, and a sharp female voice inquired their business?

"Give this to your master, sweetheart," replied Wyvil, slipping a purse through the grating; "and tell him that two gentlemen desire to consult him."

"He is engaged just now," replied the woman, in a much softer tone; "but I will take your message to him."

"You have more money than wit," laughed Lydyard. "You should have kept back your fee, till you had got your information."

"In that case I should never have received any," replied Wyvil. "I have taken the surest means of obtaining admission to the house."

As he spoke, the door was unbolted by the woman, who proved to be young, and rather pretty. She had a light in her hand, and directing them to follow her, led the way to a sort of ante-room, divided, as it appeared, from a larger room by a thick black curtain. Drawing aside the drapery, their conductress ushered them into the presence of three individuals, who were seated at a table, strewn with papers, most of which were covered with diagrams and astrological calculations.

One of these persons immediately arose on their appearance, and gravely but courteously saluted them. He was a tall man, somewhat advanced in life, being then about sixty-three, with an aquiline nose, dark eyes, not yet robbed of their lustre, grey hair waving over his shoulders, and a pointed beard and moustache. The general expression of his countenance was shrewd and penetrating, and yet there were certain indications of credulity about it, showing that he was as likely to be imposed upon himself, as to delude others. It is scarcely necessary to say that this was Lilly.

The person on his right, whose name was John Booker, and who like himself was a proficient in astrology, was so buried in calculation that he did not raise his eyes from the paper on the approach of the strangers. He was a stout man, with homely, but thoughtful features, and though not more than a year older than Lilly, looked considerably his senior. With the exception of a few silver curls hanging down the back of his neck, he was completely bald, but his massive and towering brow seemed to indicate the possession of no ordinary intellectual qualities. He was a native of Manchester, and of a good family, and was born in 1601. "His excellent verses upon the twelve months," says Lilly, in his autobiography, "framed according to the configurations of each month, being blessed with success according to his predictions, procured him much reputation all over England. He was a very honest man," continues the same authority, "abhorred any deceit in the art he studied; had a curious fancy in judging of thefts; and was successful in resolving love-questions. He was no mean proficient in astronomy; understood much in physic; was a great admirer of the antimonial cup; and not unlearned in chemistry, which he loved well, but did not practise." At the period of this history, he was clerk to Sir Hugh Hammersley, alderman.

The third person,—a minor canon of Saint Paul's, named Thomas Quatremain,—was a grave, sallow-complexioned man, with a morose and repulsive physiognomy. He was habited in the cassock of a churchman of the period, and his black velvet cap lay beside him on the table. Like Booker, he was buried in calculations, and though he looked up for a moment as the others entered the room, he instantly resumed his task without regard to their presence.

After looking earnestly at his visitors for a few moments, and appearing to study their features, Lilly motioned them to be seated, but they declined the offer.

"I am not come to take up your time, Mr. Lilly," said Wyvil, "but simply to ask your judgment in a matter in which I am much interested."

"First, permit me to return you your purse, sir, since it is from you, I presume, I received it," replied the astrologer. "No information, that I can give, deserves so large a reward as this."

Wyvil would have remonstrated; but seeing the other resolute, he was fain to concede the point.

"What question do you desire to have resolved, sir?" pursued Lilly.

"Shall I be fortunate in my hopes?" rejoined Wyvil.

"You must be a little more precise," returned the astrologer. "To what do your hopes relate?—to wealth, dignity, or love?"

"To the latter," replied Wyvil.

"So I inferred from your appearance, sir," rejoined Lilly, smiling. "Venus was strong in your nativity, though well-dignified, and I should, therefore, say you were not unfrequently entangled in love-affairs. Your innamorata, I presume, is young, perhaps fair,—blue-eyed, brown-haired, tall, slender, and yet perfectly proportioned."

"She is all you describe," replied Wyvil.

"Is she of your own rank?" asked Lilly.

"No,—scarcely," replied Wyvil, hesitating before he answered the question.

"I will instantly erect a scheme," replied the astrologer, rapidly tracing a figure on a sheet of paper. "The question refers to the Seventh House. I shall take Venus as the natural significatrix of the lady. The moon is in trine with the lord of the ascendant,—so far good. But there is a cross aspect from Mars, who darts forth malicious rays upon them. Your suit will probably be thwarted. But what Mars bindeth, Venus dissolveth. It is not wholly hopeless. I should recommend you to persevere."

"Juggler!" exclaimed Wyvil, between his teeth.

"I am no juggler," replied Lilly, angrily; "and to prove I am not, I will tell you who you are who thus insult me, though you have not announced yourself, and are desirous of preserving your incognito. You are the Earl of Rochester, and your companion is Sir George Etherege."

"Fore heaven! we are discovered," cried the Earl—"but whether by art magic, or from previous acquaintanceship with our features, I pretend not to determine."

"In either case, my lord,—for it is useless, since you have avowed yourself, to address you longer as Wyvil," replied Etherege,—"you owe Mr. Lilly an apology for the insult you have offered him. It was as undeserved as uncalled for, for he described your position with Amabel exactly."

"I am sorry for what I said," replied the Earl, with great frankness, "and entreat Mr. Lilly to overlook it, and impute it to its real cause,—disappointment at his judgment."

"I wish I could give you better hopes, my lord," replied Lilly; "but I readily accept your apology. Have you any further questions to ask me?"

"Not to-night," replied the Earl,—"except that I would gladly learn whether it is your opinion that the plague will extend its ravages?"

"It will extend them so far, my lord, that there shall neither be buriers for the dead, nor sound to look after the sick," replied Lilly. "You may have seen a little tract of mine, published in 1651—some fourteen years ago—called 'Monarchy or no Monarchy in England,' in which, by an hieroglyphic, I foretold this terrible calamity."

"I heard his Majesty speak of the book no later than yesterday," replied Rochester. "He has the highest opinion of your skill, Mr. Lilly,—as he cannot blind himself to the fact, that you foretold his father's death. But this is not the only visitation with which you threaten our devoted city."

"It is threatened by Heaven, not by me, my lord," replied Lilly. "London will be devoured by plague, and consumed by fire."

"In our time?" asked Etherege.

"Before two years have passed over our heads," returned the astrologer. "The pestilence originated in the conjunction of Saturn and Jupiter in Sagittarius, on the tenth of last October, and the conjunction of Saturn and Mars, in the same sign, on the twelfth of November. It was harbingered, also, by the terrible comet of January, which appeared in a cadent and obscure house, denoting sickness and death; and another and yet more terrible comet, which will be found in the fiery triplicity of Aries, Leo, and Sagittarius, will be seen before the conflagration."

"My calculations are that the plague will be at its worst in August and September, and will not cease entirely till the beginning of December," observed Booker, laying aside his pen.

"And I doubt not you are right, sir," said Lilly, "for your calculations are ever most exact."

"My labour is not thrown away, Mr. Lilly," cried Quatremain, who had finished his task at the same time. "I have discovered, what I have long suspected, that treasure is hidden in Saint Paul's. Mercury is posited in the north angle of the north house, the Dragon's tail is likewise within it; and as Sol is the significator, it must be gold."

"True," replied Lilly.

"Furthermore," proceeded Quatremain, "as the sign is earthy, the treasure must be buried in the vaults."

"Undoubtedly," said Booker.

"I am all impatience to search for it," said Quatremain. "Let us go there at once, and make trial of the mosaical rods?"

"With all my heart," replied Lilly. "My lord," he added to Rochester,—"I must pray you to excuse me. You have heard what claims my attention."

"I have," returned the Earl, "and should like to accompany you in the quest, if you will permit me."

"You must address yourself to Mr. Quatremain," rejoined Lilly. "If he consents, I can make no objection."

The minor canon, on being appealed to, signified his acquiescence, and after some slight preparation,

Lilly produced two hazel rods, and the party set out.

A few minutes' walking brought them to the northern entrance of the cathedral, where they speedily aroused the poor verger, who began to fancy he was to have no rest that night. On learning their purpose, however, he displayed the utmost alacrity, and by Quatremain's directions went in search of his brother verger, and a mason, who, being employed at the time in making repairs in the chantries, lodged within the cathedral.

This occasioned a delay of a few minutes, during which Rochester and Etherege had an opportunity, like that enjoyed a short time before by Leonard Holt, of beholding the magnificent effect of the columned aisles, by moonlight. By this time, the other verger, who was a young and active man, and the mason, arrived, and mattocks, spades, and an iron bar, being procured, and a couple of torches lighted, they descended to Saint Faith's.

Nothing more picturesque can be conceived than the effect of the torchlight on the massive pillars and low-browed roof of the subterranean church. Nor were the figures inappropriate to the scene. Lilly, with the mosaical rods in his hand, which he held at a short distance from the floor, moving first to one point, then to another,—now lingering within the gloomy nave, now, within the gloomier aisles; the grave minor canon, who kept close beside him, and watched his movements with the most intense anxiety; Booker, with his venerable head uncovered, and his bald brow reflecting a gleam from the torches; the two court gallants in their rich attire; and the vergers and their comrade, armed with the implements for digging—all constituted a striking picture. And as Rochester stepped aside to gaze at it, he thought he had never beheld a more singular scene.

Hitherto, no success had attended the searchers. The mosaical rods continued motionless. At length, however, Lilly reached a part of the wall where a door appeared to have been stopped up, and playing the rods near it, they turned one over the other.

"The treasure is here!" he exclaimed. "It is hidden beneath this flag."

Instantly, all were in action. Quatremain called to his assistants to bring their mattocks and the iron bar. Rochester ran up, and tendered his aid; Etherege did the same; and in a few moments, the flag was forced from its position.

On examination, it seemed as if the ground beneath it had been recently disturbed, though it was carefully trodden down. But without stopping to investigate the matter, the mason and the younger verger commenced digging. When they were tired, Lilly and Quatremain took their places, and in less than an hour, they had got to a depth of upwards of four feet. Still, nothing had been found, and Lilly was just about to relinquish his spade to the mason, when, plunging it more deeply into the ground, it struck against some hard substance.

"It is here—we have it," he cried, renewing his exertions.

Seconded by Quatremain, they soon cleared off the soil, and came to what appeared to be a coffin, or a large chest. Both then got out of the pit to consider how they should remove the chest; and the whole party were discussing the matter, when a tremendous crash, succeeded by a terrific yell, was heard at the other end of the church, and a ghastly and half-naked figure, looking like a corpse broken from the tomb, rushed forward with lightning swiftness, and shrieking—"My treasure!—my treasure!—you shall not have it!"—thrust aside the group, and plunged into the excavation.

When the bystanders recovered sufficient courage to drag the unfortunate sexton out of the pit, they found him quite dead.

CHAPTER IX.

THE MINIATURE.

ACCORDING to his promise, Doctor Hodges visited the grocer's house early on the following day, and the favourable opinion he had expressed respecting Stephen Bloundel was confirmed by the youth's appearance. The pustule had greatly increased in size, but this the doctor looked upon as a good sign; and after applying fresh poultices, and administering a hot posset-drink, he covered the patient with blankets, and recommending as much tranquillity as possible, he proceeded, at Bloundel's request, to ascertain the state of health of the rest of the family. Satisfied that all the household,—including Blaize, who, being a little out of order from the quantity of medicine he had swallowed, kept his bed,—were uninfected, he went up stairs, and finding the two boys quite well, and playing with their little sister Christiana, in the happy unconsciousness of childhood, he tapped at the door of Mrs. Bloundel's chamber, and was instantly admitted. Amabel did not raise her eyes at his entrance, but continued the employment on which she was engaged. Her mother, however, overwhelmed him with inquiries as to the sufferer, and entreated him to prevail upon her husband to let her take his place at the sick bed.

"I cannot accede to your request, madam," replied Hodges, "because I think the present arrangement the best that could be adopted."

"And am I not to see poor Stephen again?" cried Mrs. Bloundel, bursting into tears.

"I hope you will soon see him again, and not lose sight of him for many years to come," replied the doctor. "As far as I can judge, the danger is over, and, aided by your husband's care and watchfulness, I have little doubt of bringing the youth round."

"You reconcile me to the deprivation, doctor," rejoined Mrs. Bloundel. "But can you ensure my husband against the distemper?"

"I can ensure no one against contagion," replied Hodges, "but there is much in his favour. He has no fear, and takes every needful precaution. You must hope for the best. I think it right to tell you, that you will be separated from him for a month."

"Separated from my husband for a month, doctor!" cried Mrs. Bloundel. "I must see him to-day. I have something of importance to say to him."

At this point of the conversation, Amabel for the first time looked up. Her eyes were red and inflamed with weeping, and her looks betrayed great internal suffering.

"You cannot see my father, mother," she said, in a broken and supplicatory tone.

"But she can write to him, or send a message by me," rejoined Hodges. "I will deliver it when I go down stairs."

"What my mother has to say cannot be confided to a third party, sir," returned Amabel.

"Better defer it, then," said the doctor, who, as he looked hard at her, and saw the colour mount to her cheeks, began to suspect something of the truth. "Whatever you have to say, Mrs. Bloundel, may be very well delayed, for the house is now closed, with a watchman at the door, and will continue so for a month to come. No one can quit it, except members of our profession, searchers, nurses, and other authorised persons, during that time."

"But can no one enter it, do you think?" asked Mrs. Bloundel.

"No one would desire to do so, I should conceive,—except a lover," replied Hodges, with a sly look at Amabel, who instantly averted her gaze. "Where a pretty girl is concerned, the plague itself has no terrors."

"Precisely my opinion, doctor," rejoined Mrs. Bloundel; "and as I cannot consult my husband, perhaps you will favour me with your advice as to how I ought to act, if such a person as you describe should get into the house."

"I seldom meddle with family matters," rejoined Hodges, "but I feel so much interest in all that relates to Mr. Bloundel, that I am induced to depart from my rule on the present occasion. It is evident you have lost your heart," he added to Amabel, whose blushes told him he was right,— "but not I hope to one of those worthless court-gallants, who, as I learn from common report, are in the habit of toasting you daily. If it is so, you must subdue your passion, for it cannot lead to good. Be not dazzled by a brilliant exterior, which often conceals a treacherous heart, but try to fix your affections on some person of little pretension, but of solid worth. Never, I grieve to say, was there a season when such universal profligacy prevailed as at present.

Never was it so necessary for a young maiden, possessed of beauty like yours, to act with discretion. Never was a court so licentious as that of our sovereign, Charles the Second, whose corrupt example is imitated by all those around him, while its baneful influence extends to all classes. Were I to echo the language of the preachers, I should say it was owing to the wickedness and immorality of the times, that this dreadful judgment of the plague has been inflicted upon us. This I merely bring forward as an argument to prove to you, Amabel, that if you would escape the moral contagion by which you are threatened, you must put the strictest guard upon your conduct."

Amabel faintly murmured her thanks.

"You speak as my husband himself would have spoken," said Mrs. Bloundel. "Ah! we little thought when we prayed that the pestilence might be averted from us, that a worse calamity was behind, and that one of the most profligate of the courtiers you have mentioned would find his way to our house."

"One of the most profligate of them?" cried Hodges. "Who, in Heaven's name?"

"He calls himself Maurice Wyvil," replied Mrs. Bloundel.

"I never heard of such a person," rejoined the doctor. "It must be an assumed name. Have you no letter, or token, that might lead to his discovery," he added, turning to Amabel.

"I have his portrait," she replied, drawing a small miniature from her bosom.

"I am glad I have seen this," said the doctor slightly starting as he cast his eyes upon it. "I hope it is not too late to save you, Amabel," he added, in a severe tone. "I hope you are free from contamination?"

"As I live, I am," she replied. "But you recognise the likeness?"

"I do," returned Hodges. "It is the portrait of one whose vices and depravity are the town's cry, and whose name, coupled with that of a woman, is sufficient to sully her reputation."

"It is the Earl of Rochester," said Mrs. Bloundel.

"You have guessed aright," replied the doctor; "it is."

Uttering an exclamation of surprise and terror, Amabel fell back in her chair.

"I thought it must be that wicked nobleman," cried Mrs. Bloundel. "Would you believe it, doctor, that he forced himself into the house—nay, into this room, last night, and would have carried off my daughter, in spite of her resistance, if I had not prevented him."

"I can believe anything of him," replied Hodges. "But your husband, of course, knows nothing of the matter?"

"Not as yet," replied Mrs. Bloundel. "But I authorize you to tell him all."

"Mother, dear mother," cried Amabel, flinging herself on her knees before her, "I implore you not to add to my father's present distress. I might not have been able to conquer my attachment to Maurice Wyvil, but now that I find he is the Earl of Rochester, I regard him with abhorrence."

"If I could believe you sincere," said Mrs. Bloundel, "I might be induced to spare your father the pain which the knowledge of this unfortunate affair will necessarily inflict."

"I am sincere,—indeed I am," replied Amabel.

"To prove that the Earl could not have had honourable intentions towards you, Amabel," said the doctor, "I may mention that he is at this moment urging his suit with Mistress Mallet,—a young heiress."

"Ah!" exclaimed Amabel, bitterly.

"I was in attendance upon Mistress Stewart, the King's present favourite, the day before yesterday," continued Hodges, "and heard his Majesty entreat her to use her influence with Mistress Mallet in Rochester's behalf. After this, you cannot doubt the nature of his intentions towards yourself."

"I cannot—I cannot," rejoined Amabel. "He is perfidy itself. But is Mistress Mallet very beautiful, doctor?"

"Very beautiful, and very rich," he replied, "and the Earl is desperately in love with her. I heard him declare laughingly to the King, that if she would not consent to marry him, he would carry her off."

"Just what he said to me," exclaimed Amabel—"perjured and faithless that he is!"

"Harp on that string, doctor," whispered Mrs. Bloundel. "You understand her feelings exactly."

"Strangely enough," pursued the doctor, who, having carefully examined the miniature, had opened the back of the case, and could not repress a smile at what he beheld—"strangely enough, this very picture will convince you of the Earl's inconstancy. It was evidently designed for Mistress Mallet, and as she would not accept it, transferred to you."

"How do you know this, sir?" inquired Amabel, in a mortified tone.

"Hear what is written within it," answered Hodges, laying the open case before her, and reading as follows:—"To the sole possessor of his heart, the fair Mistress Mallet, this portrait is offered by her devoted slave—ROCHESTER." "The sole possessor of his heart!" So you have no share in it, you perceive, Amabel. "Her devoted slave!" Is he your 'slave' likewise? Ha! ha!"

"It is his writing," cried Amabel. "This note," she added, producing a billet, "is in the same hand. My eyes are, indeed, opened to his treachery."

"I am glad to hear it," replied Hodges, "and if I can preserve you from the snares of this noble libertine, I shall rejoice as much as in curing your brother of the plague. But can you rely upon yourself, in case the Earl should make another attempt to see you?"

"I can," she avowed confidently.

"In that case, there is nothing to apprehend," rejoined Hodges; "and I think it better on many accounts not to mention the subject to your father. It would only distract his mind, and prevent him from duly discharging the painful task he has undertaken. Were I in your place, Amabel, I would not only forget my present perfidious lover, but would instantly bestow my affections on some worthy person."

"It would gladden me if she would do so," said Mrs. Bloundel.

"There is your father's apprentice, Leonard Holt,—a good-looking, well-grown lad," pursued the doctor,— "and I much mistake if he is insensible to your attractions."

"I am sure he loves her dearly, doctor," replied Mrs. Bloundel. "He is as well-principled as well-looking. I have never had a fault to find with him since he came to live with us. It would rejoice me, and I am sure would not displease my husband, to see our child united to Leonard Holt."

"Well, what say you, Amabel?" asked Hodges. "Can you give him a hope?"

"Alas! no!" replied Amabel, "I have been deceived once, but I will not be deceived a second time. I will never wed."

"So every woman says, after her first disappointment," observed Hodges; "but not one in ten adheres to the resolution. When you become calmer, I would recommend you to think seriously of Leonard Holt."

At this moment, a tap was heard at the door, and opening it, the doctor beheld the person in question.

"What is the matter?" cried Hodges. "I hope nothing is amiss."

"Nothing whatever," replied Leonard, "but my master wishes to see you before you leave the house."

"I will go to him at once," replied the doctor. "Good day, Mrs. Bloundel. Take care of your daughter, and I hope she will take care of herself. We have been talking about you, young man," he added, in a low tone, to the apprentice, "and I have recommended you as a husband to Amabel."

"There was a time, sir," rejoined Leonard, in a tone of deep emotion, "when I hoped it might be so, but that time is past."

"No such thing," replied the doctor. "Now is the time to make an impression. Her heart is on the rebound. She is satisfied of her lover's treachery. Her mother is on your side. Do not neglect the present opportunity, for another may not arrive." With this he pushed Leonard into the room, and shutting the door upon him, hurried down stairs.

"You have arrived at a seasonable juncture, Leonard," observed Mrs. Bloundel, noticing the apprentice's perplexity, and anxious to relieve it. "We have just discovered that the person calling himself Maurice Wyvil is no other than the Earl of Rochester."

"Indeed!" exclaimed Leonard.

"Yes, indeed," returned Mrs. Bloundel. "But this is not all. Amabel has promised to forget him, and I have urged her to think of you."

"Amabel," said Leonard, advancing towards her, and taking her hand, "I can scarcely credit what I hear. Will you confirm your mother's words?"

"Leonard," returned Amabel, "I am not insensible to your good qualities, and no one can more truly esteem you than I do. Nay, till I unfortunately saw the Earl of Rochester, whom I knew not as such, I might have loved you. But now, I cannot call my heart my own. I have not the affection you deserve to bestow upon you. If I can obliterate this treacherous man's image from my memory—and Heaven, I trust, will give me strength to do so—I will strive to replace it with your own."

"That is all I ask," cried Leonard, dropping on his knee before her, and pressing his lips to her hand.

"Nothing would make me happier than to see you united, my children," said Mrs. Bloundel, bending affectionately over them.

"And I would do anything to make you happy, dear mother," replied Amabel, gently withdrawing her hand from that of the apprentice.

"Before I leave you," said Leonard, rising, "I must give you this note. I found it lying before your chamber-door as I passed this morning. How it came there I know not, but I can give a shrewd guess as to the writer. I ought to tell you, that but for what has just occurred, I should not have delivered it to you."

"It is from Wyvil—I mean Rochester," said Amabel, taking the note with a trembling hand.

"Let me see it, child," cried Mrs. Bloundel, snatching it from her, and breaking the seal. "Insolent!" she exclaimed, as she cast her eyes over it. "I can scarcely contain my indignation. But let him cross my path again, and he shall find whether I cannot resent such shameful usage."

"What does he say, dear mother?" asked Amabel.

"You shall hear," replied Mrs. Bloundel, "though I blush to repeat his words:—'Amabel, you are mine. No one shall keep you from me. Love like mine will triumph over all obstacles!—Love like his, forsooth!'" she remarked, "let him keep such stuff as that for Mistress Mallett, or his other mistresses. But I will go on: 'I may be foiled ninety-nine times, but the hundredth will succeed. We shall soon meet again."

'MAURICE WYVIL.'"

"Never," cried Amabel. "We will never meet again. If he holds me thus cheaply, I will let him see that he is mistaken. Leonard Holt, I have told you the exact state of my feelings. I do not love you now, but I regard you as my best friend, and love may come hereafter. If, in a month's time, you claim my hand,—if my father consents to our union, for you are aware that my mother will not oppose it,—I am your's."

Leonard attempted to speak, but his voice was choked with emotion, and the tears started to his eyes.

"Farewell," said Amabel. "Do not let us meet till the appointed time. Rest assured, I will think of you as you deserve to be thought of."

"We could not meet till that time, even if you desired it," said Leonard, "for your father has forbidden any of the household, except old Josyaa, to approach you till all fear of contagion is at an end, and I am now transgressing his commands. But your mother, I am sure, will acquit me of intentional disobedience."

"I do," replied Mrs. Bloundel; "it was the doctor who forced you into the room. But I am heartily glad he did so."

"Farewell, Amabel," said Leonard. "Though I shall not see you, I will watch carefully over you." And looking at her with unutterable affection, he quitted the chamber.

"You must now choose between the heartless and depraved nobleman, who would desert you as soon as won," observed Mrs. Bloundel, "and the honest apprentice, whose life would be devoted to your happiness."

"I have chosen," replied her daughter.

Doctor Hodges found the grocer writing at a small table, close to the bedside of his son.

"I am happy to tell you, Mr. Bloundel," he said, in a low tone, as he entered the room, "that all your family are still free from infection, and with due care will, I hope, continue so. But I entirely approve of your resolution of keeping apart from them till the month has expired. If your son goes on as he is doing now, he will be as strong as ever in less than a fortnight. Still, as we cannot foresee what may occur, it is better to err on the cautious side."

"Pray be seated for a moment," rejoined the grocer, motioning the other to the chair. "I mentioned to you last night that in case my son recovered, I had a plan which I trusted (under Providence!) would preserve my family from the further assaults of the pestilence."

"I remember your alluding to it," replied Hodges, "and should be glad to know what it is."

"I must tell it you in confidence," rejoined Bloundel, "because I think secrecy essential to its entire accomplishment. My plan is a very simple one, and only requires firmness in its execution,—and that quality I think I possess. It is your opinion I know, as it is my own, that the plague will increase in violence, and endure for months,—probably till next winter. My intention is to store my house with provisions, as a ship is victualled for a long voyage, and then to shut it up entirely till the scourge ceases."

"If your project is practicable," said Hodges, after a moment's reflection, "I have no doubt it will be attended with every good result you can desire. This house, which is large and roomy, is well adapted for your purpose. But you must consider well whether your family will submit to be imprisoned during the long period you propose."

"They shall remain close prisoners, even if the pestilence lasts for a twelvemonth," replied the grocer. "Whoever quits the house, when it is once closed, and on whatever plea, be it wife, son, or daughter, returns not. That is my fixed resolve."

"And you are right," rejoined Hodges, "for on that determination the success of your scheme entirely depends."

While they were thus conversing, Leonard entered the chamber, and informed his master that Chowles, the coffin-maker, and Mrs. Malmayns, the plague-nurse, desired to see him.

"Mrs. Malmayns!" exclaimed Hodges, in surprise. "I heard that something very extraordinary occurred last night in Saint Faith's. With your permission, Mr. Bloundel, she shall be admitted. I want to ask her a few questions. You had better hesitate about hiring her," he observed to the grocer, as Leonard departed, "for she is a woman of very indifferent character, though she may (for aught I know) be a good and fearless nurse."

"If there is any doubt about her, I cannot hesitate," returned Bloundel.

As he said this, the door was opened by Leonard, and Chowles and Judith entered the room. The latter, on seeing the doctor, looked greatly embarrassed.

"I have brought you the nurse I spoke of, Mr. Bloundel," said Chowles, bowing, "and am come to inquire whether you want a coffin to-night."

"Mr. Bloundel is not likely to require a coffin at present, Chowles," returned the doctor, severely; "neither does his son stand in need of a nurse. How is your husband, Mrs. Malmayns?"

"He is dead, sir," replied Judith.

"Dead!" echoed the doctor. "When I left him, at one o'clock this morning, he was doing well. Your nursing seems to have accelerated his end."

"His death was occasioned by an accident, sir," replied Judith. "He became delirious about three o'clock, and in spite of all my efforts to detain him, started out of bed, rushed into Saint Faith's, and threw himself into a pit, which Mr. Lilly and some other persons had dugged in search of treasure."

"This is a highly improbable story, Mrs. Malmayns," returned Hodges, "and I must have the matter thoroughly investigated before I lose sight of you."

"I will vouch for the truth of Mrs. Malmayns's statement," interposed Chowles.

"You!" cried Hodges, contemptuously.

"Yes, I," replied the coffin-maker. "It seems that the sexton had found a chest of treasure buried in Saint Faith's, and being haunted by the idea that some one was carrying it off, he suddenly sprang out of bed, and rushed to the church, where, sure enough, Mr. Lilly, Mr. Quatremain, the Earl of Rochester, and Sir George Etherege, having, by the help of mosaical rods, discovered this very chest, were digging it up. Poor Matthew instantly plunged into the grave, and died of the sudden chill."

"That is not unlikely," observed Hodges, after a pause. "But what has become of the treasure?"

"It is in the possession of Mr. Quatremain, who has given notice of it to the proper authorities," replied Chowles. "It consists, as I understand, of gold pieces struck in the reign of Philip and Mary, images of the same metal, crosses, pyxes, chalices, and other Popish and superstitious vessels, buried, probably, when Queen Elizabeth came to the throne, and the religion changed."

"Not unlikely," replied Hodges. "Where is your husband's body, Mrs. Malmayns?"

"It has been removed to the vault which he usually occupied," replied Judith. "Mr. Chowles has undertaken to bury him to-night."

"I must see him first," replied Hodges, "and be sure that he has not met with foul play."

"And I will accompany you," said Chowles. "So you do not want a coffin, Mr. Bloundel?"

The grocer shook his head.

"Good day, Mr. Bloundel," said Hodges. "I shall visit you to-morrow, and hope to find your son as well as I leave him. Chowles, you will be answerable for the safe custody of Mrs. Malmayns."

"I have no desire to escape, sir," replied the nurse. "You will find every thing as I have represented."

"We shall see," replied the doctor. "If not, you will have to tend the sick in Newgate."

The trio then proceeded to Saint Paul's, and descended to the vaults. Hodges carefully examined the body of the unfortunate sexton, but though he entertained some suspicions, he could not pronounce positively that he had been improperly treated; and as the statement of Mrs. Malmayns was fully borne out by the vergers and others, he did not think it necessary to pursue the investigation further. As soon as he was gone, Judith accompanied the coffin-maker to his residence, where she remained till the evening, when she was suddenly summoned in a case of urgency, by a messenger from Sibbald, the apothecary of Clerkenwell.

CHAPTER X.

THE DUEL.

AFTER Parravicin's terrible announcement, Disbrowe offered him no further violence, but flinging down his sword, burst open the door, and rushed up stairs. His wife was still insensible, but the fatal mark that had betrayed the presence of the plague to the Knight manifested it also to him, and he stood like one entranced, until Mrs. Disbrowe, recovering from her swoon, opened her eyes, and gazing at him, cried,—“You here!—Oh! Disbrowe, I dreamed you had deserted me—had sold me to another.”

“Would it were a dream!” replied her husband.

“And was it not?” she rejoined, pressing her hand to her temples. “Is it true! Oh! yes, I feel it is. Every circumstance rushes upon me plainly and distinctly. I see the daring libertine before me. He stood where you stand, and told me what you had done.”

“What did he tell you, Margaret?” asked Disbrowe, in a hollow voice.

“He told me you were false—that you loved another, and had abandoned me.”

“He lied!” exclaimed Disbrowe, in a voice of uncontrollable fury. “It is true that, in a moment of frenzy, I was tempted to set you—yes, you, Margaret—against all I had lost at play—and was compelled to yield up the key of my house to the winner. But I have never been faithless to you—never.”

“Faithless or not,” replied his wife, bitterly, “it is plain you value me less than play, or you would not have acted thus.”

“Reproach me not, Margaret,” replied Disbrowe. “I would give worlds to undo what I have done.”

“Who shall guard me against the recurrence of such conduct?” said Mrs. Disbrowe, coldly. “But you have not yet informed me how I was saved?”

Disbrowe averted his head.

“What mean you?” she cried, seizing his arm. “What has happened? Do not keep me in suspense? Were you my preserver?”

“Your preserver was the plague,” rejoined Disbrowe, in a sombre tone.

The unfortunate lady then, for the first time, perceived that she was attacked by the pestilence, and a long and dreadful pause ensued, broken only by exclamations of anguish from both.

“Disbrowe!” cried Margaret, at length, raising herself in bed, "you have deeply—irrecoverably injured me. But promise me one thing."

"I swear to do whatever you may desire," he replied.

"I know not, after what I have heard, whether you have courage for the deed," she continued. "But I would have you kill this man."

"I will do it," replied Disbrowe.

"Nothing but his blood can wipe out the wrong he has done me," she rejoined. "Challenge him to a duel—a mortal duel. If he survives, by my soul, I will give myself to him."

"Margaret!" exclaimed Disbrowe.

"I swear it," she rejoined, "and you know my passionate nature too well to doubt I will keep my word."

"But you have the plague?"

"What does that matter? I may recover."

"Not so," muttered Disbrowe. "If I fall, I will take care you do not recover. I will fight him tomorrow," he added, aloud.

He then summoned his servants, but when they found their mistress was attacked by the plague, they framed some excuse to leave the room, and instantly fled the house. Driven almost to his wits' end, Disbrowe went in search of other assistance, and was for awhile unsuccessful, until a coachman to whom he applied, offered, for a suitable reward, to drive to Clerkenwell—to the shop of an apothecary, named Sibbald (with whose name the reader is already familiar), who was celebrated for his treatment of plague-patients, and to bring him to the ether's residence. Disbrowe immediately closed with the man, and in less than two hours, Sibbald made his appearance. He was a singular and repulsive personage, with an immense hooked nose, dark, savage-looking eyes, a skin like parchment, and high round shoulders, which procured him the nickname of Æsop among his neighbours. He was under the middle size, and of a spare figure, and in age might be about sixty-five.

On seeing Mrs. Disbrowe he at once boldly asserted that he could cure her, and proceeded to apply his remedies. Finding the servants fled, he offered to procure a nurse for Disbrowe, and the latter thanking him, eagerly embraced the offer. Soon after this, he departed. In the evening the nurse, who (as may be surmised) was no other than Judith Malmayns, arrived, and immediately commenced her functions.

Disbrowe had no rest that night. His wife slept occasionally for a few minutes, but apparently engrossed by one idea, never failed when she awoke, to urge him to slay Parravicin, repeating her oath to give herself to the Knight if he came off victorious. Worn out at length, Disbrowe gave her a fearful look and rushed out of the room.

He had not been alone many minutes when he was surprised by the entrance of Judith. He eagerly inquired whether his wife was worse, but was informed she had dropped into a slumber.

"Hearing what has passed between you," said the nurse, "and noticing your look when you left the room, I came to tell you that if you fall in this duel, your last moments need not be embittered by any thoughts of your wife. I will take care she does not recover."

A horrible smile lighted up Disbrowe's features.

"You are the very person I want," he said. "When I would do evil, the fiend rises to my bidding. If I am slain, you know what to do. How shall I requite the service?"

"Do not concern yourself about that, captain," rejoined Judith. "I will take care of myself."

About noon, on the following day, Disbrowe, without venturing to see his wife, left his house, and proceeded to the Smyrna, where, as he expected, he found Parravicin and his companions.

The Knight instantly advanced towards him, and laying aside for the moment his reckless air, inquired, with a look of commiseration, after his wife.

"She is better," replied Disbrowe, fiercely. "I am come to settle accounts with you."

"I thought they were settled long ago," returned Parravicin, instantly changing his manner. "But I am glad to find you consider the debt unpaid."

Disbrowe lifted the cane he held in his hand, and struck the Knight with it forcibly on the shoulder—"Be that my answer," he said.

"I will have your life first, and your wife afterwards," replied Parravicin, furiously.

"You shall have her if you slay me, but not otherwise," retorted Disbrowe. "It must be a mortal duel."

"It must," replied Parravicin. "I will not spare you this time."

"Spare him!" cried Pillichody. "Shield of Agamemnon! I should hope not. Spit him as you would a wild boar."

"Peace, fool!" cried Parravicin. "Captain Disbrowe, I shall instantly proceed to the west side of Hyde-park, beneath the trees. I shall expect you there. On my return, I shall call on your wife."

"I pray you do so, sir," replied Disbrowe, disdainfully.

Both then quitted the coffee-house,—Parravicin attended by Rochester and Pillichody, and Disbrowe accompanied by a military friend whom he accidentally encountered. Each party taking a coach, they soon reached the ground,—a retired spot, completely screened from observation by trees. The preliminaries were soon arranged, for neither would admit of delay. The conflict then commenced with great fury on both sides, but Parravicin, in spite of his passion, observed far more caution than his antagonist, and taking advantage of an unguarded movement occasioned by the other's impetuosity, passed his sword through his body. Disbrowe fell.

"You are again successful," he groaned. "But save my wife—save her."

"What mean you?" cried Parravicin, leaning over him, as he wiped his sword.

But Disbrowe could make no answer. His utterance was choked by a sudden effusion of blood on the lungs, and he instantly expired. Leaving the body in care of the second, Parravicin and his friends returned to the coach, where the Major rejoiced greatly at the issue of the duel, but the Knight looked grave, and pondered upon the words of the dying man. After a time, however, he recovered his spirits, and dined with his friends at the Smyrna, but they observed that he drank more deeply than usual. His excesses did not, however, prevent him from playing with his usual skill, and he won a large sum from Rochester at hazard.

Flushed with success, and heated with wine, he walked up to Disbrowe's residence, about an hour after midnight. As he approached the house, he observed a strangely-shaped cart at the door, and halting for a moment, saw a body, wrapped in a shroud, brought out. Could it be Mrs. Disbrowe? Rushing forward to one of the assistants in black cloaks—and who was no other than Chowles,—asked who he was about to inter?

"It is a Mrs. Disbrowe," replied the coffin-maker. "She died of grief, because her husband was killed this morning in a duel,—but as she had the plague, it must be put down to that. We are not particular in such matters, and shall bury her and her husband together; and as there is no money left to pay for coffins, they must go to the grave without them. What, ho! Mother Malmayns, let Jonas have the captain as soon as you have stripped him. I must be starting."

And as the body of his victim was brought forth, Parravicin fell against the wall in a state almost of stupefaction.

At this moment, Solomon Eagle, with his brazier on his head, suddenly turned the corner of the street, and stationing himself before the dead-cart, cried in a voice of thunder, "Woe to the libertine! woe to the homicide! for he shall perish in everlasting fire; Woe! woe!"

END OF THE FIRST BOOK.

BOOK THE SECOND.

CHAPTER XI.

THE PROGRESS OF THE PESTILENCE.

TOWARDS the end of May, the bills of mortality began to swell greatly in amount, and though but few were put down to the plague, and a large number to the spotted fever (another frightful disorder raging at the period), it was well known that the bulk had died of the former disease. The rigorous measures adopted by the authorities (whether salutary or not has been questioned), in shutting up houses, and confining the sick and sound within them for forty days, were found so intolerable, that most persons were disposed to run any risk rather than be subjected to such a grievance, and every artifice was resorted to to conceal a case when it occurred. Hence, it seldom happened, unless by accident, that a discovery was made. Quack doctors were secretly consulted, instead of the regular practitioners; the searchers were bribed to silence; and large fees were given to the undertakers and buriers to lay the deaths to the account of some other disorder. All this, however, did not blind the eyes of the officers to the real state of things. Redoubling their vigilance, they entered houses on mere suspicion; inflicted punishments where they found their orders disobeyed or neglected; sent the sound to prison,—the sick to the pest-house; and replaced the faithless searchers by others upon whom they could place reliance. Many cases were thus detected; but in spite of every precaution the majority escaped; and the vent was no sooner stopped in one quarter, than it broke out with additional violence in another.

By this time, the alarm had become general. All, whose business or pursuits permitted it, prepared to leave London, which they regarded as a devoted city, without delay. As many houses were, therefore, closed from the absence of the inhabitants, as from the presence of the plague, and this added to the forlorn appearance of the streets, which in some quarters were almost deserted. For a while, nothing was seen at the great outlets of the city, but carts, carriages, and other vehicles, filled with goods and moveables, on their way to the country; and, as may be supposed, the departure of their friends did not tend to abate the dejection of those whose affairs compelled them to remain behind.

One circumstance must not pass unnoticed, namely, the continued fineness and beauty of the weather. No rain had fallen for upwards of three weeks. The sky was bright and cloudless; the atmosphere, apparently, pure and innoxious; while the heat was as great as is generally experienced in the middle of summer. But, instead of producing its usual enlivening effect on the spirits, the fine weather added to the general gloom and apprehension, inasmuch as it led to the belief (afterwards fully confirmed), that if the present warmth was so pernicious, the more sultry seasons, which were near at hand, would aggravate the fury of the pestilence. Sometimes, indeed, when the deaths were less numerous, a hope began to be entertained that the distemper was abating, and confidence was for a moment restored; but these anticipations were speedily checked by the re-appearance of the scourge, which seemed to baffle and deride all human skill and foresight.

London now presented a lamentable spectacle. Not a street but had a house in it marked with a red cross,—some streets had many such. The bells were continually tolling for burials, and the dead-carts went their melancholy rounds at night, and were constantly loaded. Fresh directions were issued by the authorities; and as domestic animals were considered to be a medium of conveying the infection, an order, which was immediately carried into effect, was given to destroy all dogs and cats. But this plan proved prejudicial rather than the reverse, as the bodies of the poor animals, most of which were drowned in the Thames, being washed ashore, produced a horrible and noxious effluvia, supposed to contribute materially to the propagation of the distemper.

No precautionary measure was neglected; but it may be doubted whether any human interference could have averted the severity of the scourge, which, though its progress might be checked for a few days by attention, or increased in the same ratio by neglect, would, in the end, have unquestionably fulfilled its mission. The College of Physicians, by the King's command, issued simple and intelligible directions, in the mother tongue, for the sick. Certain of their number, amongst whom was the reader's acquaintance, Doctor Hodges, were appointed to attend the infected; and two out of the Court of Aldermen were required to see that they duly executed their dangerous office. Public prayers and a general fast were likewise enjoined. But Heaven seemed deaf to the supplications of the doomed inhabitants,—their prayers being followed by a fearful increase of deaths. A vast crowd was collected within Saint Paul's to hear a sermon preached by Doctor Sheldon, archbishop of Canterbury,—a prelate greatly distinguished, during the whole course of the visitation, by his unremitting charity and attention to the sick; and before the discourse was concluded, several fell down within the sacred walls, and, on being conveyed to their own homes, were found to be attacked by the distemper. On the following day, too, many others who had been present were seized with the disorder.

A fresh impulse was given to the pestilence from an unlooked-for cause. It has been mentioned that the shutting up of houses and seclusion of the sick was regarded as an intolerable grievance; and though most were compelled to submit to it, some few resisted, and tumults and disturbances ensued. As the plague increased, these disturbances became more frequent, and the mob always taking part against the officers, they were frequently interrupted in the execution of their duty.

About this time, a more serious affray than usual occurred, attended with loss of life, and other unfortunate consequences, which it may be worth while to relate, as illustrative of the peculiar state of the times. The wife of a merchant, residing in Lothbury, being attacked by the plague, the husband, fearing lest his house would be shut up, withheld all information from the examiners and searchers. His wife died, and immediately afterwards one of his children was attacked. Still, he refused to give notice. The matter, however, got wind. The searchers arrived at night, and being refused admittance, broke into the house. Finding undoubted evidence of infection, they ordered it to be closed, stationed a watchman at the door, and marked it with the fatal sign. The merchant remonstrated against their proceedings, but in vain. They told him he might think himself well off that he was not carried before the Lord Mayor, who would undoubtedly send him to Ludgate; and with other threats to the like effect, they departed.

The unfortunate man's wife and child were removed the following night in the dead-cart, and driven half mad by grief and terror, he broke open the door of his dwelling, and plunging a sword in the watchman's breast, who opposed his flight, gained the street. A party of the watch happened to be passing at the time, and the fugitive was instantly secured. He made a great clamour, however,—calling to his neighbours and the by-standers to rescue him, and in another moment, the watch was beaten off, and the merchant placed on a post, whence he harangued his preservers on the severe restraints imposed upon the citizens, urging them to assist him in throwing open the doors of all infected houses, and allowing free egress to their inmates.

Greedily listening to this insane counsel, the mob resolved to act upon it. Headed by the merchant, they ran down Threadneedle-street, and crossing Stocks'-market, burst open several houses in Bear-binder-lane, and drove away the watchmen. One man, more courageous than the others, tried to maintain his post, and was so severely handled by [his assailants, that he died a few days afterwards of the injuries he had received. Most of those who had been imprisoned within their dwellings immediately issued forth, and joining the mob, which received fresh recruits each moment, started on the same errand.

Loud shouts were now raised of—"Open the doors! No plague prisoners! No plague prisoners!" and the mob set off along the Poultry. They halted, however, before the Great Conduit, near the end of Bucklersbury, and opposite Mercers'-hall, because they perceived a company of the Train-bands advancing to meet them. A council of war was held, and many of the rabble were disposed to fly; but the merchant again urged them to proceed, and they were unexpectedly aided by Solomon Eagle, who, bursting through their ranks with his brazier on his head, crying, "Awake! sleepers awake! the plague is at your doors! awake!" speeded towards the Train-bands, scattering sparks of fire as he pursued his swift career. The mob instantly followed, and adding their shouts to his outcries, dashed on with such fury that the Train-bands did not dare to oppose them, and, after a slight and ineffectual resistance, were put to rout.

The merchant, who acted as leader, informed them that there was a house in Wood-street shut up, and the crowd accompanied him thither. In a few minutes, they had reached Bloundel's shop, but finding no one on guard, for the watchman, guessing their errand, had taken to his heels, they smeared over the fatal cross and inscription with a pail of mud gathered from the neighbouring kennel, and then broke open the door. The grocer and his apprentice, hearing the disturbance, and being greatly alarmed at it, hurried to the shop, and found it full of people.

"You are at liberty, Mr. Bloundel," cried the merchant, who was acquainted with the grocer. "We are determined no longer to let our families be imprisoned at the pleasure of the Lord Mayor and aldermen. We mean to break open all the plague houses, and set free their inmates."

"For heaven's sake, consider what you are about

Mr. Barcroft," cried the grocer. "My house has been closed for nearly a month. Nay, as my son has entirely recovered, and received his certificate of health from Doctor Hodges, it would have been opened three days hence, by the officers, so that I have suffered all the inconvenience of the confinement, and can speak to it. It is, no doubt, very irksome, and may be almost intolerable to persons of an impatient temperament. But I firmly believe it is the only means to check the progress of contagion. Listen to me, Mr. Barcroft,—listen to me, good friends, and hesitate before you violate laws which have been made expressly to meet this terrible emergency."

Here he was checked by loud groans and upbraidings from the bystanders.

"He tells you himself that the period of his confinement is just over," cried Barcroft. "It is plain he has no interest in the matter, except that he would have others suffer as he has done. Heed him not, my friends. But proceed with the good work. Liberate the poor plague prisoners. Liberate them! On! on!"

"Forbear, rash men!" cried Bloundel, in an authoritative voice. "In the name of those you are bound to obey, I command you to desist."

"Command us!" cried one of the bystanders, raising his staff in a menacing manner. "Is this your gratitude for the favour we have just conferred upon you? Command us, forsooth. You had better repeat the order, and see how it will be obeyed."

"I do repeat it," rejoined the grocer, firmly. "In the Lord Mayor's name, I command you to desist, and return to your homes."

The man would have struck him with his staff, if he had not been himself felled to the ground by Leonard. This was the signal for greater outrage. The grocer and his apprentice were instantly assailed by several others of the mob, who leaving them both on the floor covered with bruises, helped themselves to all they could lay hands on in the shop, and then quitted the premises.

It is scarcely necessary to track their course further, and it may be sufficient to state that they broke open upwards of fifty houses in different streets. Many of the plague-stricken joined them, and several half-naked creatures were found dead in the streets on the following morning. Two houses in Blackfriars-lane were set on fire, and the conflagration was with difficulty checked, nor was it until late on the following day that the mob could be entirely dispersed. The originator of the disturbance, Barcroft, after a desperate resistance, was shot through the head by a constable.

The result of this riot, as will be easily foreseen, was greatly to increase the pestilence; and many of those who had been most active in it perished, in the prisons to which they were conveyed, of the distemper. Far from being discouraged by the opposition offered to their decrees, the city authorities enforced them with greater rigour than ever, and doubling the number of the watch, again shut up all those houses which had been broken open during the late tumult.

Bloundel received a visit from the Lord Mayor, Sir John Lawrence, who, having been informed of his conduct, came to express his high approval of it, offering to remit the few days yet unexpired of his quarantine. The grocer, however, declined the offer, and with renewed expressions of approbation, Sir John Lawrence took his leave.

Three days afterwards, the examiner of health pronounced the grocer's house free from infection. The fatal mark was obliterated from the door; the shutters were unfastened; and Bloundel resumed his business as usual. Words are inadequate to describe the delight that filled the breast of every member of his family, on their first meeting after their long separation. It took place in the room adjoining the shop. Mrs. Bloundel received the joyful summons from Leonard, and on descending with her children, found her husband and her son Stephen anxiously expecting her. Scarcely able to make up her mind as to which of the two she should embrace first, Mrs. Bloundel was decided by the pale countenance of her son, and rushing towards him she strained him to her breast, while Amabel flew to her father's arms. The grocer could not repress his tears—but they were tears of joy, and that night's happiness made him amply amends for all the anxiety he had recently undergone.

"Well, Stephen, my dear child," said his mother, as soon as the first tumult of emotion had subsided, "Well, Stephen," she said, smiling at him through her tears, and almost smothering him with kisses, "you are not so much altered as I expected, and I do not think if I had had the care of you, I could have nursed you better myself. You owe your father a second life, and we all owe him the deepest gratitude for the care he has taken of you."

"I can never be sufficiently grateful for his kindness," returned Stephen, affectionately.

"Give thanks to the beneficent being who has preserved you from this great danger, my son, not to me," returned Bloundel. "The first moments of our reunion should be worthily employed."

So saying, he summoned the household, and for the first time for a month the whole family party assembled as before at prayer. Never were thanksgivings more earnestly, more devoutly uttered. All arose with bright and cheerful countenances, and even Blaize seemed to have shaken off his habitual dread of the pestilence. As he retired with Patience, he observed to her, "Master Stephen looks quite well, though a little thinner. I must ascertain from him the exact course of treatment pursued by his father. I wonder whether Mr. Bloundel would nurse me if I were to be suddenly seized with the distemper?"

"If he wouldn't, I would," replied Patience; "and I am sure I could bring you through."

"Thank you,—thank you," replied Blaize. "I begin to think we shall get through it. I shall go out to-morrow and examine the Bills of Mortality, and see what progress the plague is making. I am all anxiety to know. I must get a fresh supply of medicine, too. My private store is quite gone, except three of my favourite refuses, which I shall take before I go to bed to-night. Unluckily, my purse is as empty as my phials."

"I can lend you a little money," said Patience. "I haven't touched my last year's wages. They are quite at your service."

"You are too good," replied Blaize; "but I won't decline the offer. I heard a man crying a new anti-pestilential elixir as he passed the house yesterday. I must find him out, and buy a bottle. You are a good girl, Patience, and I'll marry you as soon as the plague ceases."

"I have something else to give you," rejoined Patience. "This little bag contains a hazel nut, from which I have picked the kernel, and filled its place with quicksilver, stopping the hole with wax. Wear it round your neck, and you will find it a certain preservative against the pestilence."

"Who told you of this remedy?" asked Blaize, taking the bag.

"Your mother," returned Patience.

"I wonder I never heard of it," said the porter.

"She wouldn't mention it to you, because the doctor advised her not to put such matters into your head," replied Patience. "But I couldn't help indulging you. Heigho! I hope the plague will soon be over."

"It won't be over for six months," rejoined Blaize, shaking his head. "I read in a little book, published in 1593, in Queen Elizabeth's reign, and written by Simon Kelway, 'that when little children flock together, and pretend that some of their number are dead, solemnizing the burial in a mournful sort, it is a certain token that a great mortality is at hand.' This I have myself seen more than once. Again, just before the great sickness of 1625, the churchyard wall of Saint Andrew's Holborn, fell down. I need not tell you that the same thing occurred after the frost this winter."

"I heard of it," replied Patience. "But I did not know it was a bad sign."

"It is a dreadful sign," returned Blaize, with a shudder. "The thought of it brings back my old symptoms. I must have a supper to guard against infection,—a slice of toasted bread, sprinkled with vinegar, and powdered with nutmeg."

And chattering thus, they proceeded to the kitchen.

Before supper could be served, Doctor Hodges made his appearance. He was delighted to see the family assembled together again, and expressed a hearty wish that they might never more be divided. He watched Amabel and Leonard carefully, and seemed annoyed that the former rather shunned than favoured the regards of the apprentice.

Leonard, too, looked disconcerted; and though he was in possession of his mistress's promise, he did not like to reclaim it. During the whole of the month, he had been constantly on the watch, and had scarcely slept at night, so anxious was he to prevent the possibility of any communication taking place between Rochester and his mistress. But in spite of all his caution, it was possible he might be deceived. And when on this, their first meeting, she returned his anxious gaze with averted looks, he felt all his jealous misgivings return.

Supper, meanwhile, proceeded. Doctor Hodges was in excellent spirits, and drank a bottle of old sack with great relish. Overcome by the sight of his wife and children, the grocer abandoned himself to his feelings. As to his wife, she could scarcely contain herself, but wept and laughed by turns—now embracing her husband, now her son, between whom she had placed herself. Nor did she forget Doctor Hodges; and such was the exuberance of her satisfaction, that when the repast was ended she arose, and flinging her arms about his neck, termed him the preserver of her son.

"If any one is entitled to that appellation it is his father," replied Hodges, "and I may say, that in all my experience, I have never witnessed such generous self-devotion as Mr. Bloundel has exhibited towards his son. You must now be satisfied, madam, that no person can so well judge what is proper for the safety of his family as your husband."

"I never doubted it, sir," replied Mrs. Bloundel.

"I must apprise you, then, that he has conceived a plan by which he trusts to secure you and his children and household from any future attack," returned Hodges.

"I care not what it is,—so it does not separate me from him," replied Mrs. Bloundel.

"It does not," replied the grocer. "It will knit us more closely together than we have ever yet been. I mean to shut up my house, having previously stored it with provisions for a twelvemonth, and shall suffer no member of my family to stir forth as long as the plague endures."

"I am ready to remain within doors, if it continues twenty years," replied his wife. "But how long do you think it will last, doctor?"

"Till next December, I have no doubt," returned Hodges.

"So long!" exclaimed Amabel.

"Ay, so long," repeated the doctor. "It has scarcely begun now. Your father is right to adopt these precautions. It is the only way to insure the safety of his family."

"But"—cried Amabel.

"I am resolved," interrupted Bloundel, peremptorily. "Whoever leaves the house,—if but for a moment,—never returns."

"And when do you close it, father?" asked Amabel.

"A week hence," replied the grocer;—"as soon as I have laid in a sufficient stock of provisions."

"And am I not to leave the house for a year?" said Amabel, with a dissatisfied look.

"Why should you wish to leave it?" asked her father, curiously.

"Ay, why?" repeated Leonard, in a low tone. "I shall be here."

Amabel seemed confused, and looked from her father to Leonard. The former, however, did not notice her embarrassment, but observed to Hodges,—
"I shall begin to victual the house to-morrow."

"Amabel," whispered Leonard, "you told me if I claimed your hand in a month, you would yield it to me. I require the fulfilment of your promise."

"Give me till to-morrow," she replied, distractedly.

"She has seen Rochester," muttered the apprentice, turning away.

CHAPTER XII.

HOW THE GROCER VICTUALLED HIS HOUSE.

LEONARD Holt was wrong in his suspicions of Amabel. She had neither seen nor heard from Rochester, but, if the truth must be told, he was never out of her mind, and she found, to her cost, that the heart will not be controlled. Convinced as she was of her noble lover's perfidy, and aware that she was acting wrongfully in cherishing a passion for him, after the exposure of his base designs towards herself, no reasoning of which she was capable, could banish him from her thoughts, or enable her to transfer her affections to the apprentice. She so far deceived herself, that she fancied she was emancipated from the Earl's thralldom; and strove to persuade herself she would avoid him if he ever crossed her path. But she could not overcome her repugnance to Leonard, and she determined to revoke the promise, which she now felt had been rashly made, of bestowing her hand upon him, if he claimed it, at the expiration of the month.

This conflict of feeling produced its natural result. She became thoughtful and dejected—was often in tears—had no appetite—and could scarcely rouse herself sufficiently to undertake any sort of employment. Her mother watched her with great anxiety, and feared, though she sought to disguise it from herself,—what was the cause of her despondency. She trusted, however, to time to work some beneficial result, and resolved to leave nothing undone to induce her daughter to give her hand, even if she could not give her heart with it, to the apprentice.

Things were in this position at the end of the month, and it occasioned no surprise to Mrs. Bloundel, though it afflicted her deeply, to find that Amabel sedulously avoided the apprentice's regards on their first meeting. When Doctor Hodges was gone, and the rest of the family had retired, she observed to her husband, "Before you shut up the house as you propose, I should wish one important matter to be settled."

"What is it?" asked the grocer.

"I should wish to have Amabel married," replied his wife.

"Married!" exclaimed Bloundel, in astonishment. "To whom?"

"To Leonard Holt," was the reply.

Bloundel could scarcely repress his displeasure.

"It is time enough to talk of that a year hence," he answered.

"I don't think so," returned his wife,—
"and now, since the proper time for the disclosure of the secret has arrived, I must tell you that the gallant who called himself Maurice Wyvil, was the Earl of Rochester."

"Ha!" exclaimed the grocer, while an angry flush stained his cheek, "has that libertine dared to enter my house?"

"He has," replied Mrs. Bloundel. "He has entered it more than once without your knowledge."

"Indeed!" cried her husband, with difficulty controlling his indignation. "When was he here—tell me quickly?"

Mrs. Bloundel then proceeded to relate all that had occurred, and her husband listened with profound attention to her recital. At its close, he made no remark, but arose and paced the chamber for some time in great agitation.

At length, he suddenly paused, and, regarding his wife with great sternness, observed in a severe tone, "You have done very wrong in concealing this from me, Honora,—very wrong."

"If I have erred, it was to spare you uneasiness," returned his wife, bursting into tears. "Doctor Hodges agreed with me that it was better not to mention the subject while you had so many other anxieties pressing upon you."

"I have a stout heart, which will enable me to bear up against most misfortunes," returned the grocer; "but this was a point on which, under any circumstances, I should have been consulted. And I must own I am surprised that Doctor Hodges should advise the contrary."

"He was influenced, like myself, by the kindest feelings towards you," sobbed Mrs. Bloundel.

"Well, well, I will not reproach you further," returned the grocer, somewhat moved by her tears. "I have no doubt you acted for the best. Is it your opinion that our poor deluded child still entertains any regard for this profligate nobleman?"

"I am sure she does," replied Mrs. Bloundel; "and it is from that conviction that I so strongly urge the necessity of wedding her to Leonard Holt."

"I will never compel her to do anything to endanger her future happiness," returned the grocer; "as is likely to be the case if she marries Leonard Holt without loving him. It is better to risk an uncertain evil, than to rush upon a certain one."

"Then I fear something worse will occur," replied his wife.

"What!" cried Bloundel; "am I to understand that you have no reliance on Amabel's principles? Has all our care been thrown away?"

"I do not distrust her," returned Mrs. Bloundel; "but consider with whom she has to deal. She is beset by the handsomest and most fascinating man of the day—by one allowed to be the most practised in all the arts most dangerous to our sex—and who is a nobleman to boot. Some allowance must be made for her."

"I will make none," rejoined Bloundel, sternly. "She has been brought up in principles that ought to have enabled her to resist temptation in whatever guise it presented itself; and if the instruction she has received had produced the right impression, she would have done so. I am deeply grieved to find that such is not the case, and that she must trust to others for protection, when she ought to be able to defend herself."

"We must take things as we find them," returned Mrs. Bloundel. "But am I to understand that you will not urge this marriage upon her?"

"I will never force her inclinations," said the grocer, "nor will I do so much injustice to Leonard Holt. But I will turn the matter over in my mind. At present, I am greatly troubled and perplexed."

No more was said on the subject, and the grocer and his wife shortly afterwards retired to rest.

On the following morning, Bloundel remarked to the apprentice, as they stood together in the shop, "Leonard, you are aware that I am about to shut up my house. Before doing so, I must make certain needful arrangements. I will not disguise from you that I wish you to remain with me, but at the same time, I beg you distinctly to understand that I will not detain you against your will. Your articles are within two months of expiring; and, if you desire it, I will deliver them to you to-morrow, and release you from the rest of your time."

"I do not desire it, sir," replied Leonard. "I will remain as long as I can be serviceable to you."

"Take time for reflection," rejoined his master. "In all probability, it will be a long confinement, and you may repent having subjected yourself to it when too late."

"Last month's experience has taught me what I have to expect," replied Leonard, with a smile. "My mind is made up. I will stay with you."

"Be it so," returned Bloundel. "I have something further to say to you. My wife has acquainted me with the daring attempt of the Earl of Rochester to carry off Amabel."

"Has my mistress told you of my attachment to your daughter?" demanded Leonard, trembling, in spite of his efforts to maintain a show of calmness.

Bloundel nodded in the affirmative.

"And of her promise to bestow her hand upon me, if I claimed it at the month's end?" continued the apprentice.

"No!" replied the grocer, a good deal surprised—"I never heard of such a promise. I was not aware the matter had gone so far. But have you claimed it?"

"I have," replied Leonard; "but she declined giving an answer till to-day."

"We will have it then at once," said Bloundel. "Come with me."

So saying, he led the way to the inner room, where they found Amabel and her mother. At the sight of Leonard, the former instantly cast down her eyes.

"Amabel," said her father, coldly, "all that has passed is known to me. I shall take another and more fitting opportunity to speak to you on your ill-advised conduct. I am come for a different purpose. You have given Leonard Holt a promise, and he claims the fulfilment of it."

"If he insists upon my compliance," replied Amabel, in a tremulous voice, "I must obey. But it will make me wretched."

"Then I at once release you," replied Leonard. "I value your happiness far more than my own."

"You deserve better treatment, Leonard," said Bloundel; "and I am sorry my daughter cannot discern what is for her good. Let us hope that time will work a change in your favour."

"No," replied the apprentice, bitterly; "I will no longer delude myself with any such vain expectation."

"Amabel," observed the grocer, "as your father—as your well-wisher—I should desire to see you wedded to Leonard. But, as I have already stated to your mother, I will never control your inclinations. You must be guided, therefore, by your own feelings, and I will only attempt to direct you so far as I think likely to be conducive to your happiness. On another point, I must assume a very different tone. You can no longer plead ignorance of the designs of the depraved Earl of Rochester, who, if he has done nothing more, has marred the prospects of a most deserving young man, and destroyed, for a time, your own peace of mind. You may not be able to forget him—but you can avoid him. If you see him alone again—if but for a moment—I cast you off for ever. Yes, for ever,” he repeated, in a tone of great severity.

“I will never voluntarily see him again,” replied Amabel, tremblingly.

“You have heard my determination,” rejoined her father, sternly. “Do you still adhere to your resolution of remaining with me, Leonard,” he added, turning to the apprentice, “or shall I give you up your articles?”

“I will stay,” replied Leonard.

“There will be one advantage, which I did not foresee, in closing my house,” said the grocer; “it will effectually keep away this libertine Earl.”

“Perhaps so,” replied the apprentice, in a low tone; “but I have more faith in my own vigilance than in bolts and shutters.”

Bloundel and Leonard then returned to the shop, where the former immediately began to make preparations for storing his house; and in the furtherance of his scheme the apprentice was of the greatest use to him.

The grocer's dwelling, as has been stated, was large and commodious. It was three stories high; and beneath the ground floor there were kitchens and extensive cellars. Many of the rooms were spacious, and had curiously carved fire-places, walls pannelled with fine brown oak, large presses and cupboards,—but as it will be necessary hereafter more particularly to describe them, we need only mention them now.

At the back of the habitation, as may be recollected from Rochester's adventure, was a yard, surrounded by high walls, where there was a pump, from which excellent water was obtained. There were likewise three large cisterns, supplied from the New River. Not satisfied with this, and anxious to obtain water in which no infected body could have lain, or clothes have been washed, Bloundel had a large tank placed within the cellar, and connecting it by pipes with the pump, he contrived an ingenious machine, by which he could work the latter from within the house,—thus making sure of a constant supply of water, direct from the spring.

He next addressed himself to the front of the house, where he fixed a pulley, with a rope and hook attached to it, to the beam above one of the smaller bay-windows on the second story. By this means, he could let down a basket or any other article into the street, or draw up whatever he desired; and as he proposed using this outlet as his sole means of communication with the external world when his house was closed, he contrived a wooden shutter of a particular form, to be opened and shut at pleasure, and which he had lined with tin, that no moisture might adhere to it,—it being the opinion of Doctor Hodges, whom he consulted on the point, that the damp that settled on wood attracted and retained the infected matter.

It may be mentioned that it was his intention to station himself in the small room upon which the shutter opened, and whenever he held any communication below, to flash off a pistol, so that the smoke of the powder, driving out the external air, might purify any vapour that found entrance, of its noxious particles.

He laid down to himself a number of regulations, which will be more easily shown, and more clearly understood, when we arrive at the period when his plans were in full operation. To give an instance, however,—if a letter should be conveyed to him by means of his pulley, he proposed to steep it in a solution of vinegar and sulphur; and when dried and otherwise fumigated, to read it at a distance, by the help of strong glasses.

In regard to provisions, after a careful calculation, he bought upwards of three thousand pounds weight of hard sea biscuits, similar to those now termed captain's biscuits, and had them stowed away in hogsheads. He next ordered twenty huge casks of the finest flour, which he had packed up with the greatest care, as if for a voyage to Barbadoes or Jamaica. As these were brought in through the back-yard, an accident occurred which might have proved fatal to his design. While superintending the labours of Leonard and Blaize, who were rolling the casks into the house,—having stowed away as many as he conveniently could in the upper part of the premises,—he descended to the cellar, and opening a door in the yard, called to them to lower the remaining barrels with ropes below. In the hurry, Blaize rolled a cask towards the open door, and in another instant it would have fallen upon the grocer, and, perhaps, crushed him, but for the interposition of Leonard. Bloundel made no remark at the time, but he never forgot the service rendered him by the apprentice.

To bake his bread he required an oven, and he accordingly built one in the garret, laying in a large stock of wood for fuel. Neither did he neglect to provide himself with several large barrels of meal.

But the most important consideration was butcher's meat, and for this purpose he went to Rotherhithe, where the plague had not yet appeared, and agreed with a butcher to kill him twelve fat bullocks, and pickle and barrel them as if for sea stores. He likewise directed the same man to provide six large barrels of pickled pork, on the same understanding. These were landed at Queenhithe, and brought up to Woodstreet, so that they passed for newly-landed grocery.

Hams and bacon forming part of his own trade, he wrote to certain farmers with whom he was in the habit of dealing, to send him up an unlimited supply of fitches and gammons; and his orders being promptly and abundantly answered, he soon found he had more bacon than he could possibly consume. He likewise laid in a good store of tongues, hung beef, and other dried meats.

As to wine, he already had a tolerable stock, but he increased it by half a hogshead of the best canary he could procure; two casks of Malmsey, each containing twelve gallons; a quarter-cask of Malaga sack; a runlet of muscadine; two small runlets of aqua vitæ; twenty gallons of aniseed water; and two eight-gallon runlets of brandy. To this he added twelve hogsheads of strongly-hopped Kent ale, calculated for keeping, which he bestowed in a cool cellar, together with six hogsheads of beer, for immediate use. Besides these, he procured a variety of distilled waters for medical purposes, amongst which he included a couple of dozen of the then-fashionable and costly preparation, denominated plague-water.

As, notwithstanding all his precautions, it was far from unlikely that some of his household might be attacked by the distemper, he took care to provide proper remedies; and to Blaize's infinite delight, furnished himself with mithridate, Venice treacle, diascordium, the pill rufus (oh, how the porter longed to have the key of the medicine chest!), London treacle, turpentine, and other matters. He likewise collected a number of herbs and simples, as Virginian snakeweed, contrayerva, pestilence-wort, angelica, elicampane, zedoary, tormentil, valerian, lovage, devilsbit, dittany, master-wort, rue, sage, ivy-berries, walnuts, bole armoniac, terra sigillata, bezoar-water, oil of sulphur, oil of vitriol, and other compounds. His store of remedies was completed by three tuns of the best white vinegar, and a dozen jars of salad oil.

Regulating his supplies by the provisions he had laid in, he purchased a sufficient stock of coals and fagots to last him during the whole period of his confinement; and he added two barrels of gunpowder, and a like quantity of sulphur, for fumigation.

His eatables would not have been complete without cheese, and he, therefore, ordered about six hundred weight from Derbyshire, Wiltshire, and Leicestershire, besides about two dozen of large old cheeses from Rostherne, in Cheshire,—even then celebrated for the best dairies in the whole county. Butter was sent him out of Berkshire, and he salted down several large tubs, as well as several pots, which he received from Suffolk.

It being desirable, considering the long period he meant to close his house, to provide himself and his family with every necessary, he procured a sufficient stock of wearing apparel, shoes, and boots. Spice, dried fruit, and other grocery articles, were not required, because he already possessed them. Candles also formed an article of his trade, and lamp oil; but he was recommended by Doctor Hodges, from a fear of the scurvy, to provide a plentiful supply of lemon and lime juice.

To guard against accident, he also stocked his house with glass, earthenware, and vessels of every description liable to be broken. He took especial care to destroy all vermin, such as rats and mice. Nor did he spare the domestic animals, and he occasioned great distress to his little daughter Christiana, by ordering her favourite spaniel to be drowned. He had a small grated wicket made in the street door, to be used in case of emergency; and he directed that the topmost story should be fitted up with beds, to form a hospital, if any part of the family should be seized with the distemper, so that the sick might be sequestered from the sound.

These preparations were not complete till the last day of May.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE QUACK DOCTORS.

WHILE the grocer was thus storing his house, his schemes were well nigh thwarted by Blaize, as we shall now proceed to relate. Patience, it may be remembered, had promised to give the porter her earnings to enable him to procure a fresh supply of medicine, and a few days after he had received the trifling amount, he sallied forth to visit a neighbouring apothecary, named Parkhurst, from whom he had been in the habit of purchasing drugs, and who occupied a small shop not far from the grocer's, on the opposite side of the street. Parkhurst appeared overjoyed to see him, and without giving him time to prefer his own request, inquired after his master's family,—whether they were all well, especially fair Mistress Amabel,—and, further, what was the meaning of the large supplies of provision which he saw conveyed daily to the premises? Blaize shook his head at the latter question, and for some time refused to answer it; but being closely pressed by Parkhurst, admitted that his master was about to shut up his house.

"Shut up his house!" exclaimed Parkhurst. "I never heard of such a preposterous idea. If he does so, not one of you will come out alive. But I should hope he will be dissuaded from his rash design."

"Dissuaded!" echoed Blaize. "You don't know my master. He's as obstinate as a mule, when he takes a thing into his head. Nothing will turn him. Besides, Doctor Hodges sanctions, and even recommends the plan."

"I have no opinion of Doctor Hodges," sneered the apothecary. "He is not fit to hold a candle before a learned friend of mine, a physician, who is now in that room. The person I speak of thoroughly understands the pestilence, and never fails to cure every case that comes before him. No shutting up houses with him. He is in possession of an infallible remedy."

"Indeed!" exclaimed Blaize, pricking up his ears. "What is his name?"

"His name—ha!" cried Parkhurst, with a puzzled look. "How strange it should slip my memory. Ah, now, I recollect. It is Doctor Calixtus Bottesham."

"A singular name, truly," remarked Blaize, "but it sounds like that of a clever man."

"Doctor Calixtus Bottesham is a wonderful man," returned the apothecary. "I have never met with his like. I would trumpet forth his merits through the whole city, but that it would ruin my trade. The plague is our harvest, as my friend Chowles, the coffin-maker, says, and it will not do to stop it—ha! ha!"

"It is too serious a subject to laugh at," returned Blaize, gravely. "But are the doctor's fees exorbitant?"

"To the last degree," replied Parkhurst. "I am afraid to state how much he asks."

"I fear I shall not be able to consult him then," said Blaize, turning over the coin in his pocket, "and yet I should greatly like to do so."

"Have no fear on that score," returned the apothecary. "I have been able to render him an important service, and he will do anything for me. He shall give you his advice gratis."

"Thank you! thank you!" cried Blaize, transported with delight.

"Wait here a moment, and I will ascertain whether he will see you," replied Parkhurst.

So saying, he quitted the porter, who amused himself during his absence by studying the labels affixed to the jars and bottles on the shelves. He had much ado to restrain himself from opening some of them, and tasting their contents.

Full a quarter of an hour elapsed before the apothecary re-appeared.

"I am sorry to have detained you so long," he said; "but I had more difficulty with the doctor than I expected, and for some time he refused to see you on any terms, because he has a violent antipathy to Doctor Hodges, whom he regards as a mere pretender, and whose patient he conceives you to be."

"I am not Doctor Hodges's patient," returned Blaize, "and I regard him as a pretender myself."

"That opinion will recommend you to Doctor Bottesham," replied Parkhurst; "and since I have smoothed the way for you, you will find him very affable and condescending. He has often heard me speak of your master; and if it were not for his dislike of Doctor Hodges, whom he might accidentally encounter, he would call upon him."

"I wish I could get my master to employ him instead of the other," said Blaize.

"I wish so too," cried Parkhurst, eagerly. "Do you think it could be managed?"

"I fear not," returned Blaize.

"There would be no harm in making the trial," replied Parkhurst. "But you shall now see the learned gentleman. I ought to apprise you that he has two friends with him,—one a young gallant, named Hawkswood, whom he has recently cured of the distemper, and who is so much attached to him that he never leaves him; the other, a doctor like himself, named Martin Furbisher, who always accompanies him in his visits to his patients, and prepares his mixtures for him. You must not be surprised at their appearance. And now come with me."

With this, he led the way into a small room at the back of the shop, where three personages were seated at a table, with a flask of wine and glasses before them. Blaize detected Doctor Bottesham at a glance. He was an ancient-looking man, clad in a suit of rusty black, over which was thrown a velvet robe, very much soiled and faded, but originally trimmed with fur, and lined with yellow silk. His powers of vision appeared to be feeble, for he wore a large green shade over his eyes, and a pair of spectacles of the same colour. A venerable white beard descended almost to his waist. His head was protected by a long-flowing grey wig, over which he wore a black velvet cap. His shoulders were high and round, his back bent, and he evidently required support when he moved, as a crutch-headed staff was reared against his chair. On his left was a young, handsome, and richly-attired gallant, answering to the apothecary's description of Hawkswood; and on the right sat a stout personage precisely habited like himself, except that he wore a broad-leaved hat, which completely overshadowed his features. Notwithstanding this attempt at concealment, it was easy to perceive that Doctor Furbisher's face was covered with scars, that he had a rubicund nose, studded with carbuncles, and a black patch over his left eye.

"Is this the young man who desires to consult me?" asked Doctor Calixtus Bottesham, in the cracked and quavering voice of old age, to Parkhurst.

"It is," replied the apothecary, respectfully. "Go forward," he added to Blaize, "and speak for yourself."

"What ails you?" pursued Bottesham, gazing at him through his spectacles. "You look strong and hearty."

"So I am, learned sir," replied Blaize, bowing to the ground; "but understanding from Mr. Parkhurst that you have an infallible remedy against the plague, I would gladly procure it from you, as, if I should be attacked, I may not have an opportunity of consulting you."

"Why not?" demanded Bottesham. "I will come to you if you send for me."

"Because," replied Blaize, after a moment's hesitation, "my master is about to shut up his house, and no one will be allowed to go forth, or to enter it, till the pestilence is at an end."

"Your master must be mad to think of such a thing," rejoined Bottesham. "What say you, brother Furbisher,—is that the way to keep off the plague?"

"Gallipots of Galen! no," returned the other; "it is rather the way to invite its assaults."

"When does your master talk of putting this fatal design—for fatal it will be to him and all his household—into execution?" demanded Bottesham.

"Very shortly, I believe," replied Blaize. "He meant to begin on the first of June, but as the pestilence is less violent than it was, Doctor Hodges has induced him to defer his purpose for a few days."

"Doctor Hodges!" exclaimed Bottesham, contemptuously. "It was an unfortunate day for your master when he admitted that sack-drinking impostor into his house."

"I have no great opinion of his skill," replied Blaize, "but, nevertheless, it must be admitted that he brought Master Stephen through in a wonderful manner."

"Pshaw!" exclaimed Bottesham, "that was mere accident. I heard the particulars of the case from Parkhurst, and am satisfied the youth would have recovered without his aid. But what a barbarian Mr. Bloundel must be to think of imprisoning his family in this way."

"He certainly does not consult my inclinations in the matter," returned Blaize.

"Nor those of his wife and daughter, I should imagine," continued Bottesham. "How do they like it?"

"I cannot exactly say," answered Blaize. "But what a dreadful thing it would be if I should be attacked by the plague, and no assistance to be procured."

"It would be still more dreadful, if so angelic a creature as Bloundel's daughter is represented to be—for I have never seen her—should be so seized," observed Bottesham. "I feel so much interested about her that I would do anything to preserve her from the fate with which she is menaced."

"Were it not inconsistent with your years, learned sir, I might suspect you of a tenderer feeling towards her," observed Blaize, archly; "but, in good sooth her charms are so extraordinary that I should not be surprised at any effect they might produce."

"They would produce no effect on me," replied Bottesham. "I am long past such feeling. But, in respect to yourself. You say you are afraid of the plague. I will give you an electuary to drive away your panie;" and he produced a small jar, and handed it to the porter. "It is composed of conserve of roses, gillyflowers, borage, candied citron, powder of latifcans Galeni, Roman zedoary, doricum, and saffron. You must take about the quantity of a large nutmeg, morning and evening."

"You make me for ever your debtor, learned sir," rejoined Blaize.

"I will also add my remedy," said Furbisher. "It is a powder compounded of crabs' eyes, burnt hartshorn, the black tops of crabs' claws, the bone from a stag's heart, unicorn's horn, and salt of vipers. You must take one or two drams,—not more,—in a glass of hot posset-drink, when you go to bed, and swallow another draught of the same potion to wash it down."

"I will carefully observe your directions," replied Blaize, thankfully receiving the powder.

"Of all things," said Bottesham, claiming the porter's attention by tapping him on the head with his cane, "take care never to be without vinegar. It is the grand specific, not merely against the plague, but against all disorders. It is food and physic, meat and medicine, drink and julep, cordial and antidote. If you formerly took it as a sauce, now take it as a remedy. To the sound it is a preservative from sickness, to the sick a restorative to health. It is like the sword which is worn, not merely for ornament, but for defence. Vinegar is my remedy against the plague. It is a simple remedy, but an effectual one. I have cured a thousand patients with it, and hope to cure a thousand more. Take vinegar with all you eat, and flavour all you drink with it. Has the plague taken away your appetite, vinegar will renew it. Is your throat ulcerated, use vinegar as a gargle. Are you disturbed with phlegmatic humours, vinegar will remove them. Is your brain laden with vapours, throw vinegar on a hot shovel, and hold it under your nose, and you will obtain instantaneous relief. Have you the head-ache, wet a napkin in vinegar, and apply it to your temples, and the pain will cease. In short, there is no ailment that vinegar will not cure. It is the grand panacea; and may be termed the elixir of long life."

"I wonder its virtues have not been found out before," observed Blaize.

"It is surprising how slow men are in discovering the most obvious truths," replied Bottesham; "but take my advice, and never be without it."

"I never will," returned Blaize. "Heaven be praised, my master has just ordered in three tuns. I'll tap one of them directly."

"Muscles and mushrooms!" muttered Furbisher; "that idea of the vinegar-remedy is borrowed from Kemp's late treatise on the pestilence and its cure. Before you commence upon the new system, young man," he added aloud to Blaize, "let me recommend you to fortify your stomach with a glass of canary."

And pouring out a bumper, he handed it to the porter, who swallowed it at a draught.

"And now," said Bottesham, "to return to this mad scheme of your master's—is there no way of preventing it?"

"I am aware of none," replied Blaize.

"Bolts and bars!" cried Furbisher, "something must be done for the fair Amabel. We owe it to society not to permit so lovely a creature to be thus immured. What say you, Hawkswood?" he added to the gallant by his side, who had not hitherto spoken.

"It would be unpardonable to permit it,—quite unpardonable," replied this person.

"Might not some plan be devised to remove her for a short time, and frighten him out of his project?" said Bottesham. "I would willingly assist in such a scheme. I pledge you in a bumper, young man. You appear to be a trusty servant."

"I am so considered, learned sir," replied Blaize, upon whose brain the wine, thus plentifully bestowed, began to operate,—“and, I may add, justly so.”

"You really will be doing your master a service if you can prevent him from committing this folly," rejoined Bottesham. "Let us have a bottle of burnt malmsey, with a few bruised raisins in it, Mr. Parkhurst. This poor young man requires support. Be seated, friend."

With some hesitation, Blaize complied, and while the apothecary went in search of the wine, he observed to Bottesham, "I would gladly comply with your suggestion, learned sir, did I see any means of doing so."

"Could you not pretend to have the plague?" said Bottesham. "I could then attend you."

"I should be afraid of playing such a trick as that," replied Blaize. "Besides, I do not see what purpose it would answer."

"It would enable me to get into the house," returned Bottesham, "and then I might take measures for Amabel's deliverance."

"If you merely wish to get into the house," replied Blaize, "that can be easily managed. I will admit you this evening."

"Without your master's knowledge?" asked Bottesham, eagerly.

"Of course," returned Blaize.

"But there is an apprentice?" said the doctor.

"Oh! you mean Leonard Holt," replied Blaize.

"Yes, we must take care he doesn't see you. If you come about nine o'clock, he will be engaged with my master in putting away the things in the shop."

"I will be punctual," replied Bottesham, "and will bring Doctor Furbisher with me. We will only stay a few minutes. But here comes the burnt malmsey. Fill the young man's glass, Furbisher. I will insure you against the plague, if you follow my advice."

"But will you insure me against my master's displeasure, if he finds me out?" said Blaize.

"I will provide you with a new one," returned Bottesham. "You shall serve me if you wish to change your place."

"That would answer my purpose exactly," thought Blaize, "I need never be afraid of the plague if I live with him. I will turn over your proposal, learned sir," he added, aloud.

After priming him with another bumper of malmsey, Blaize's new friends suffered him to depart. On returning home, he proceeded to his own room, and, feeling unusually drowsy, he threw himself on the bed, and almost instantly dropped asleep. When he awoke, the fumes of the liquor had, in a great degree, evaporated, and he recalled, with considerable self-reproach, the promise he had given, and would gladly have recalled it, had it been possible. But it was now not far from the appointed hour, and he might expect the arrival of the two doctors every moment. The only thing that consoled him was the store of medicine he had gained, and locking it up in his cupboard, he descended to the kitchen. Fortunately, his mother was from home, so that he ran no risk from her; and, finding Patience alone, after some hesitation, he let her into the secret of his anticipated visitors. She was greatly surprised, and expressed much uneasiness, lest they should be discovered; as, if they were so, it would be sure to bring them both into trouble.

"What can they want with Mistress Amabel?" she cried. "I should not wonder if Doctor Calixtus Bottesham, as you call him, turns out a lover in disguise."

"A lover!" exclaimed Blaize. "Your silly head is always running upon lovers. He's an old man—old enough to be your grandfather, with a long white beard, reaching to his waist. He a lover! Mr. Bloundel is much more like one."

"For all that, it looks suspicious," returned Patience; "and I shall have my eyes about me on their arrival."

Shortly after this, Blaize crept cautiously up to the back yard, and opening the door, found, as he expected, Bottesham and his companion. Motioning them to follow him, he led the way to the kitchen, where they arrived without observation. Patience eyed the new-comers narrowly, and felt almost certain, from their appearance and manner, that her suspicions were correct. All doubts were removed when Bottesham, slipping a purse into her hand, begged her on some plea or other to induce Amabel to come into the kitchen. At first, she hesitated; but having a tender heart, inclining her to assist rather than oppose the course of any love affair, her scruples were soon overcome. Accordingly, she hurried up stairs, and chancing to meet with Amabel, who was about to retire to her own chamber, entreated her to come down with her for a moment into the kitchen. Thinking it some unimportant matter, but yet wondering why Patience should appear so urgent, Amabel complied. She was still more perplexed when she saw the two strangers, and would have instantly retired if Bottesham had not arrested her.

"You will pardon the liberty I have taken in sending for you," he said, "when I explain that I have done so to offer you counsel."

"I am as much at a loss to understand what counsel you can have to offer, sir, as to guess why you are here," she replied.

"Amabel," returned Bottesham, in a low tone, but altering his voice, and slightly raising his spectacles so as to disclose his features,—"It is I—Maurice Wyvil."

"Ah!" she exclaimed, in the utmost astonishment.

"I told you I would see you again," he rejoined. "And I have kept my word."

"Think not to deceive me, my lord," she returned, controlling her emotion by a powerful effort. "I am aware you are not Maurice Wyvil, but the Earl of Rochester. Your love is as false as your character. Mistress Mallet is the real object of your regards. You see I am acquainted with your perfidy."

"Amabel, you are deceived," replied Rochester. "On my soul you are. When I have an opportunity of explaining this matter more fully, I will prove to you that I was induced by the King, for an especial purpose, to pay feigned addresses to Mistress Mallet. But I never loved her. You alone are the possessor of my heart, and shall be the sharer of my title. You shall be Countess of Rochester."

"Could I believe you!" she cried.

"You may believe me," he answered. "Do not blight my hopes and your own happiness a second time. Your father is about to shut up his house for a twelvemonth, if the plague lasts so long. This done, we shall meet no more, for access to you will be impossible. Do not hesitate, or you will for ever rue your irresolution."

"I know not what to do," cried Amabel, distractedly.

"Then I will decide for you," replied the Earl, grasping her hand. "Come!"

While this was passing, Furbisher, or rather, as will be surmised, Pillichody, had taken Blaize aside, and engaged his attention by dilating upon the efficacy of a roasted onion filled with treacle in the expulsion of the plague. Patience stationed herself near the door, not with the view of interfering with the lovers, but rather of assisting them; and at the very moment that the Earl seized his mistress's hand, and would have drawn her forward, she ran towards them, and hastily whispered, "Leonard Holt is coming down stairs."

"Ah! I am lost!" cried Amabel.

"Fear nothing," said the Earl. "Keep near me, and I will soon dispose of him."

As he spoke, the apprentice entered the kitchen, and greatly surprised by the appearance of the strangers, angrily demanded from Blaize who they were.

"They are two doctors come to give me advice respecting the plague," stammered the porter.

"How did they get into the house?" inquired Leonard.

"I let them in through the back door," replied Blaize.

"Then let them out by the same way," rejoined the apprentice. "May I ask what you are doing here?" he added to Amabel.

"What is that to you, fellow," cried Rochester, in his assumed voice.

"Much, as you shall find, my lord," replied the apprentice, "for in spite of your disguise, I know you. Quit the house instantly with your companion, or I will give the alarm, and Amabel well knows what the consequences of such a step will be."

"You must go, my lord," she replied.

"I will not stir unless you accompany me," replied Rochester.

"Then I have no alternative," said Leonard. "You know your father's determination. I would willingly spare you, Amabel."

"In pity leave me," she cried to Rochester.

"I will never part with you more," he rejoined.

"Oh, goodness! what will become of us?" cried Patience—"if there isn't Mr. Bloundel coming down stairs."

"Amabel," said Leonard, sternly, "the next moment decides your fate. If the Earl departs, I will keep your secret."

"You hear that, my lord," she cried. "I command you to leave me."

With this, she disengaged herself from him, and hastily passing her father, who at that moment entered the kitchen, rushed up stairs.

On hearing the alarm of the grocer's approach, Pillichody took refuge in a cupboard, the door of which stood invitingly open, so that Bloundel only perceived the Earl.

"What is the matter?" he cried, gazing around him—"and who have we here?"

"It is a quack doctor, whom Blaize has been consulting about the plague," returned Leonard.

"See him instantly out of the house," rejoined the grocer, angrily, "and take care he never enters it again. I will have no such charlatans here."

Leonard motioned Rochester to follow him, and the latter reluctantly obeyed.

As soon as Bloundel had retired, Leonard, who had meanwhile provided himself with his cudgel, descended to the kitchen, where he dragged Pillichody from his hiding-place, and conducted him to the back door; but he did not suffer him to depart till he had soundly belaboured him. Locking the door, he then went in search of Blaize, and, on finding him, administered the same chastisement to him.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE TWO WATCHMEN.

ON the day following the events last related, as Leonard Holt was standing at the door of the shop—his master having just been called out by some important business,—a man in the dress of a watchman, with a halbert in his hand, approached him, and inquired whether he was Mr. Bloundel's apprentice.

Before returning an answer, Leonard looked hard at the new comer, and thought he had never beheld so ill-favoured a person before. Every feature in his face was distorted. His mouth was twisted on one side, his nose on the other, while his right eye-brow was elevated more than an inch above the left,—added to which, he squinted intolerably, had a long fell of straight sandy hair, a sandy beard, and mustachios, and a complexion of the colour of brick-dust.

"An ugly dog," muttered Leonard to himself, as he finished his scrutiny, "what can he want with me? Suppose I should be Mr. Bloundel's apprentice," he added, aloud, "what then, friend?"

"Your master has a beautiful daughter, has he not?" said the ill-favoured watchman.

"I answer no idle questions," rejoined Leonard, coldly.

"As you please," returned the other, in an offended tone. "A plan to carry her off has accidentally come to my knowledge, but since incivility is all I am likely to get for my pains in coming to acquaint you with it, e'en find it out yourself."

"Hold!" cried the apprentice, detaining him, "I meant no offence. Step in doors for a moment. We can converse there more freely."

The watchman, who, notwithstanding his ill-looks, appeared to be a good-natured fellow, was easily appeased, and, following the apprentice into the shop, on a promise of a handsome reward, instantly commenced his relation.

"Last night," he said, "I was keeping watch, at the door of Mr. Brackley, a saddler in Aldermanbury, whose house having been attacked by the pestilence, is now shut up, when I observed two persons, rather singularly attired, pass me. Both were dressed like old men, but neither their gait nor tone of voice corresponded with their garb."

"It must have been the Earl of Rochester and his companion," remarked Leonard.

"You are right," replied the other, "for I afterwards heard one of them addressed by that title. But to proceed. I was so much struck by the strangeness of their appearance, that I left my post for a few minutes, and followed them. They halted beneath a gateway, and as they conversed together very earnestly, and in a loud tone, I could distinctly hear what they said. One of them, the stoutest of the two, complained bitterly of the indignities he had received from Mr. Bloundel's apprentice (meaning you, of course), averring that nothing but his devotion to his companion had induced him to submit to them, and affirming, with many tremendous oaths, that he would certainly cut the young man's throat the very first opportunity."

"He shall not want it, then," replied Leonard, contemptuously, "neither shall he lack a second application of my cudgel, when we meet. But what of his companion? What did he say?"

"He laughed heartily at the other's complaints," returned the watchman; "and told him to make himself easy, for he should soon have his revenge. 'To-morrow night,' he said, 'we will carry off Amabel, in spite of the apprentice or her father. And, as I am equally indebted with yourself to the latter, we will pay off old scores with him.'"

"How do they intend to effect their purpose?" demanded Leonard.

"That I cannot precisely tell," replied the watchman. "All I could hear was, that they meant to enter the house by the back yard about midnight. And now, if you will make it worth my while, I will help you to catch them in their own trap."

"Hum!" said Leonard. "What is your name?"

"Gregory Swindlehurst," replied the other.

"To help me, you must keep watch with me to-night," rejoined Leonard. "Can you do so?"

"I see nothing to hinder me, provided I am paid for my trouble," replied Gregory. "I will find some one to take my place at Mr. Brackley's. At what hour shall I come?"

"Soon after ten," said Leonard. "Be at the shop-door, and I will let you in."

"Count upon me," rejoined Gregory; a smile of satisfaction illumining his ill-favoured countenance. "Shall I bring a comrade with me? I know a trusty fellow who would like the job. If Lord Rochester should have companions with him, assistance will be required."

"True," replied Leonard. "Is your comrade a watchman, like yourself?"

"He is an old soldier, who has been lately employed to keep guard over infected houses," replied Gregory. "We must take care his lordship does not overreach us."

"If he gets into the house without my knowledge, I will forgive him," replied the apprentice.

"He won't get into it without mine," muttered Gregory, significantly. "But do you not mean to warn mistress Amabel of her danger?"

"I shall consider of it," replied the apprentice.

At this moment, Mr. Bloundel entered the shop, and Leonard, feigning to supply his companion with a small packet of grocery, desired him, in a low tone, to be punctual to his appointment, and dismissed him. In justice to the apprentice, it must be stated that he had no wish for concealment, but was most anxious to acquaint his master with the information he had just gained, and was only deterred from doing so by a dread of the consequences it might produce to Amabel.

The evening passed off much as usual. The family assembled at prayer; and Blaiz, whose shoulders still ached with the chastisement he had received, eyed the apprentice with sullen and revengeful looks. Patience, too, was equally angry, and her indignation was evinced in a manner so droll, that at another season it would have drawn a smile from Leonard.

Supper quickly followed their devotions, and at its close Amabel left the room. Leonard followed her, and overtaking her on the landing of the stairs, said,

"Amabel, I have received certain intelligence that the Earl of Rochester will make another attempt to enter the house, and carry you off to-night."

"Oh! when will he cease from persecuting me?" she cried.

"When you cease to encourage him," replied the apprentice, bitterly.

"I do not encourage him, Leonard," she replied; "and to prove that I do not, I will act in any way you think proper to-night."

"If I could trust you," said Leonard, "you might indeed be of the greatest service in convincing the Earl that his efforts are fruitless."

"You may trust me," rejoined Amabel. "Only tell me what I can do."

"Well, then," returned Leonard, "when the family have retired to rest, come down stairs, and I will give you a part to play in my scheme."

Hastily promising compliance, Amabel disappeared; and Leonard ran down the stairs, at the foot of which he encountered Mrs. Bloundel.

"What is the matter?" she asked.

"Nothing—nothing," replied the apprentice evasively.

"That will not serve my turn," she rejoined. "Something, I am certain, troubles you, though you do not choose to confess it. Heaven grant your anxiety is not occasioned by aught relating to that wicked Earl of Rochester. I cannot sleep in my bed for thinking of him. I noticed that you followed Amabel out of the room. I hope you do not suspect anything?"

"Do not question me further, madam, I entreat," returned the apprentice. "Whatever I may suspect, I have taken all needful precautions. Rest easy, and sleep soundly, if you can. All will go well."

"I shall never rest easy, Leonard," rejoined Mrs. Bloundel, "till I see you wedded to my daughter. Then, indeed, I shall feel happy. My poor child, I am sure, is fully aware how indiscreet her conduct has been; and when this noble libertine desists from annoying her,—or rather when he is effectually shut out,—we may hope for a return of her regard for you.”

“It is a vain hope, madam,” replied Leonard, “there will be no such return. I neither expect it, nor desire it.”

“Have you ceased to love her?” asked Mrs. Bloundel, in surprise.

“Ceased to love her!” echoed Leonard, fiercely. “Would I had done so?—would I could do so! I love her too well—too well.”

And repeating the words to himself with great bitterness, he hurried away.

“His passion has disturbed his brain,” sighed Mrs. Bloundel, as she proceeded to her chamber. “I must try to reason him into calmness to-morrow.”

Half an hour after this, the grocer retired for the night, and Leonard, who had gone to his own room, cautiously opened the door and repaired to the shop. On the way, he met Amabel. She looked as pale as death, and trembled so violently that she could scarcely support herself.

“I hope you do not mean to use any violence towards the Earl, Leonard,” she said, in a supplicating voice.

“He will never repeat his visit,” rejoined the apprentice, gloomily.

“Your looks terrify me,” cried Amabel, gazing great uneasiness at his stern and determined countenance. “I will remain by you. He will go at my bidding.”

“Did he go at your bidding before?” demanded Leonard, sarcastically.

“He did not, I grant,” she replied, more supplicatingly than before. “But do not harm him—for mercy’s sake, do not—take my life sooner. I am the only person who has offended you.”

The apprentice made no reply, but unlocking a box, took out a brace of large horse pistols and a sword, which he thrust into his girdle.

“You do not mean to use those murderous weapons?” cried Amabel.

“It depends upon circumstances,” replied Leonard. “Force must be met by force.”

“Nay, then,” she rejoined, “the affair assumes too serious an aspect to be trifled with. I will instantly alarm my father.”

“Do so,” retorted Leonard, “and he will cast you off for ever.”

“Better that, than be the cause of bloodshed,” she returned. “But is there nothing I can do to prevent this fatal result?”

“Yes,” replied Leonard. “Make your lover understand he is unwelcome to you. Dismiss him for ever. On that condition, he shall depart unharmed and freely.”

“I will do so,” she rejoined.

“Then give yourself no further concern,” returned the apprentice.

Nothing more was then said. Amabel seated herself, and kept her eyes fixed on Leonard, who, avoiding her regards, stationed himself near the door.

By and bye, a slight tap was heard without, and the apprentice cautiously admitted Gregory Swindlehurst and his comrade. The latter was habited like the other watchman, in a blue night-rail, and was armed with a halbert. He appeared much stouter, much older, and so far as could be discovered of his features,—for a large handkerchief muffled his face,—much uglier than his companion. He answered to the name of Bernard Boutefeu. They had no sooner entered the shop than Leonard locked the door.

“Who are these?” asked Amabel, getting up in great alarm.

“Two watchmen whom I have hired to guard the house,” replied Leonard.

“We are come to protect you, fair mistress,” said Gregory; “and, if need be, to cut the Earl of Rochester’s throat.”

“Oh, heavens!” exclaimed Amabel.

“Ghost of Tarquin!” cried Boutefeu—“we’ll teach him to break into the houses of quiet citizens, and attempt to carry off their daughters against their will. By the soul of Dick Whittington, Lord Mayor of London, we’ll maul and mangle him.”

“Silence, Bernard Boutefeu,” interposed Gregory. “You frighten Mistress Amabel by your strange oaths.”

“I should be sorry to do that,” replied Boutefeu—“I only wish to show my zeal for her. Don’t be afraid of the Earl of Rochester, fair mistress. For all his audacity, he won’t dare to enter the house, when he finds we are there.”

“Is it your pleasure that we should thrust a halbert through his body, or lodge a bullet in his brain?” asked Gregory, appealing to Amabel.

“Harm him not, I beseech you,” she rejoined. “Leonard, I have your promise that if I can prevail upon him to depart, you will not molest him.”

“You have,” he replied.

“You hear that,” she observed to the watchmen.

“We are all obedience,” said Gregory.

“Bless your tender heart,” cried Boutefeu. “We would not pain you for the world.”

“A truce to this,” said Leonard. “Come to the yard,—we will wait for him there.”

“I will go with you,” cried Amabel, “If any harm should befall him, I should never forgive myself.”

“Remember what I told you,” rejoined Leonard, sternly. “It depends upon yourself whether he leaves this house alive.”

“Heed him not,” whispered Gregory. “I and my comrade will obey no one but you.”

Amabel could not repress an exclamation of surprise.

“What are you muttering, knave?” demanded Leonard, angrily.

"Only that the young lady may depend on our fidelity," replied Gregory. "There can be no offence in that. Come with us," he whispered to Amabel.

The latter part of his speech escaped Leonard, but the tone in which it was uttered was so significant, that Amabel, who began to entertain new suspicions, hesitated.

"You must come," said Leonard, seizing her hand.

"The fault be his, not mine," murmured Amabel, as she suffered herself to be drawn along.

The party then proceeded noiselessly towards the yard. On the way, Amabel felt a slight pressure on her arm, but, afraid of alarming Leonard, she made no remark.

The back door was opened, and the little group stood in the darkness. They had not long to wait. Before they had been in the yard five minutes, a noise was heard of footsteps and muttered voices in the entry. This was followed by a sound like that occasioned by fastening a rope-ladder against the wall and the next moment, two figures were seen above it. After dropping the ladder into the yard, these persons, the foremost of whom the apprentice concluded was the Earl of Rochester, descended. They had no sooner touched the ground than Leonard, drawing his pistols, advanced towards them.

"You are my prisoner, my lord," he said, in a stern voice, "and shall not depart with life, unless you pledge your word never to come hither again on the same errand."

"Betrayed!" cried the Earl, laying his hand upon his sword.

"Resistance is in vain, my lord," rejoined Leonard. "If you stir a footstep, I will lodge a bullet in your brain."

"Will nothing bribe you to silence, fellow?" cried the Earl. "I will give you a thousand pounds, if you will hold your tongue, and conduct me to my mistress."

"I am tempted to carry my threat into execution," returned Leonard, in a furious tone; "and can scarcely tell what stays my hand. But I have no time for discussion. Amabel is now present, and will give you your final dismissal herself."

"If I receive it from her own lips," replied the Earl, "I will instantly retire,—but not otherwise."

"Do you pledge yourself to that?" cried the apprentice, eagerly.

"Solemnly," replied the other.

"Amabel," said Leonard, in a low tone to her, "you hear what is said. Fulfil your promise."

"Do so," cried a voice, which she instantly recognised, in her ear—"I am near you."

"Ah!" she exclaimed.

"Do you hesitate?" cried the apprentice, sternly.

"My lord," said Amabel, in a faint voice, "I must pray you to retire. Your efforts are in vain. I will never fly with you."

"That will not suffice," whispered Leonard,—"you must tell him you no longer love him, or I will not suffer him to depart."

"Hear me," pursued Amabel,—"you who present yourself as Lord Rochester, I entertain no affection for you, and never wish to behold you again."

"Enough!" cried Leonard.

"Admirable!" whispered Gregory. "Nothing could be better."

"Well," cried the supposed Earl, "since I no longer hold a place in your affections, it would be idle to pursue the matter further. Heaven be praised, there are other damsels quite as beautiful, though not so cruel. Farewell, for ever, Amabel."

So saying, he mounted the ladder, and, followed by his companion, disappeared on the other side.

"He is gone," said Leonard, "and I hope for ever. Now let us return to the house."

"I am coming," rejoined Amabel.

"Let him go," whispered Gregory. "The ladder is still upon the wall. We will mount it."

And as the apprentice moved towards the house, he tried to drag her in that direction.

"I cannot—will not, fly thus," she cried.

"Ah! what is the matter?" exclaimed Leonard, suddenly turning.

"Further disguise is useless," replied the supposed Gregory Swindlehurst. "I am the Earl of Rochester. The other was counterfeit."

"Ah!" exclaimed Leonard, rushing towards them, and placing a pistol against the breast of his mistress. "Have I been duped? But it is not yet too late to retrieve my error. Move a foot further, my lord,—and do you, Amabel, attempt to fly with him, and I fire."

"You cannot mean this?" cried Rochester. "Raise your hand against the woman you love?"

"Against the woman who forgets her duty, and the libertine who tempts her, the arm that is raised is that of justice," replied Leonard. "Move another footstep, and I fire."

As he spoke, his arms were suddenly seized by a powerful grasp from behind, and striking the pistols from his hold, the Earl snatched up Amabel in his arms, and mounting the ladder, made good his retreat.

A long and desperate struggle took place between Leonard and his assailant, who was no other than Pillichody, in his assumed character of Bernard Boute-feu, and notwithstanding the superior strength of the bully, and the advantage he had taken of the apprentice, he was worsted in the end.

Leonard had no sooner extricated himself, than drawing his sword, he would have passed it through Pillichody's body, if the latter had not stayed his hand by offering to tell him where he would find his mistress, provided his life were spared.]

"Where has the Earl taken her?" cried Leonard, scarcely able to articulate from excess of passion.

"He meant to take her to Saint Paul's—to the vaults below the cathedral, to avoid pursuit," replied

Pillichody. "I have no doubt you will find her there."

"I will go there instantly and search," cried Leonard, rushing up the ladder.

CHAPTER XV.

THE BLIND PIPER AND HIS DAUGHTER.

SCARCELY knowing how he got there, Leonard Holt found himself at the great northern entrance of the cathedral. Burning with fury, he knocked at the door; but no answer being returned to the summons, he repeated it still more loudly, and shook the heavy latch with such violence as to rouse the sullen echoes of the aisles. Driven almost to desperation, he retired a few paces, and surveyed the walls of the vast structure, in the hope of descrying some point by which he might obtain an entrance.

It was a bright moonlight night, and the reverend pile looked so beautiful that, under any other frame of mind, Leonard must have been struck with admiration. The ravages of time could not now be discerned, and the architectural incongruities which, seen in the broad glare of day, would have offended the eye of taste, were lost in the general grand effect. On the left ran the magnificent pointed windows of the choir, divided by massive buttresses,—the latter ornamented with crocketed pinnacles. On the right, the building had been new faced, and its original character in a great measure destroyed, by the tasteless manner in which the repairs had been executed. On this side, the lower windows were round-headed, separated by broad pilasters, while above them ran a range of small circular windows. At the western angle was seen one of the towers (since imitated by Wren), which flanked this side of the fane, together with a part of the portico erected, about twenty-five years previously, by Inigo Jones, and which, though beautiful in itself, was totally out of character with the edifice, and, in fact, a positive blemish to it.

Insensible alike to the beauties or defects of the majestic building, and regarding it only as the prison of his mistress, Leonard Holt scanned it carefully on either side. But his scrutiny was attended with no favourable result.

Before resorting to force to obtain admission, he determined to make the complete circuit of the structure, and with this view, he shaped his course towards the east.

He found two small doors on the left of the northern transept, but both were fastened, and the low pointed windows beneath the choir, lighting the subterranean church of Saint Faith, were all barred. Running on, he presently came to a flight of stone steps at the north-east corner of the choir, leading to a portal opening upon a small chapel dedicated to Saint George. But this was secured like the others, and, thinking it vain to waste time in trying to force it, he pursued his course.

Skirting the eastern extremity of the fane—then the most beautiful part of the structure, from its magnificent rose-window,—he speeded past the low windows which opened on this side, as on the other, upon Saint Faith's, and did not pause till he came to the great southern portal, the pillars and arch of which differed but slightly in character from those of the northern entrance.

Here he knocked as before, and was answered, as on the former occasion, by sullen echoes from within. When these sounds died away, he placed his ear to the huge key-hole in the wicket, but could not even catch the fall of a footstep. Neither could he perceive any light, except that afforded by the moonbeams which flooded the transept with radiance.

Again hurrying on, he passed the cloister-walls surrounding the Convocation House; tried another door between that building and the church of Saint Gregory,—a small fane attached to the larger structure; and, failing in opening it, turned the corner, and approached the portico—the principal entrance to the cathedral being then, as now, on the west.

Erected, as before mentioned, from the designs of the celebrated Inigo Jones, this magnificent, though misplaced colonnade was completed about 1640, at which time preparations were made for repairing the cathedral throughout, and for strengthening the tower, to enable it to support a new spire. But this design, owing to the disorganised state of affairs, was never carried into execution.

At the time of the Commonwealth, while the interior of the sacred fabric underwent every sort of desecration and mutilation,—while stones were torn from the pavement, and monumental brasses from tombs,—while carved stalls were burnt, and statues plucked from their niches,—a similar fate attended the portico. Shops were built beneath it, and the sculptures ornamenting its majestic balustrade were thrown down. Amongst other obstructions, it appears that there was “a high house in the north angle, which hindered the masons from repairing that part of it.” The marble door-cases, the capitals, cornices, and pillars, were so much injured by the fires made against them that it required months to put them in order. At the Restoration, Sir John Denham, the poet, was appointed surveyor general of the works, and continued to hold the office at the period of this history.

As Leonard drew near the portico, he perceived, to his surprise, that a large concourse of people was collected in the area in front of it; and, rushing forward, he found the assemblage listening to the denunciations of Solomon Eagle, who was standing in the midst of them, with his brasier on his head. The enthusiast appeared more than usually excited. He was tossing aloft his arms in a wild and frenzied manner, and seemed to be directing his menaces against the cathedral itself.

Hoping to obtain assistance from the crowd, Leonard resolved to await a fitting period to address them. Accordingly, he joined them, and listened to the discourse of the enthusiast.

“Hear me!” cried the latter in a voice of thunder. “I had a vision last night and will relate it to you. During my brief slumbers, I thought I was standing on this very spot, and gazing, as now, upon yon mighty structure. On a sudden, the day became overcast, and ere long it grew pitchy dark. Then was heard a noise of rushing wings in the air, and I could just discern many strange figures hovering above the tower, uttering doleful cries and lamentations. All at once, these figures disappeared, and gave place to,—or it may be, were chased away by, others of more hideous appearance. The latter bore lighted brands, which they hurled against the sacred fabric, and, in an instant, flames burst forth from it on all sides. My brethren, it was a fearful, yet a glorious sight to see that vast pile wrapt in the devouring element! The flames were so vivid—so intense that I could not bear to look upon them, and I covered my face with my hands. On raising my eyes again, the flames were extinguished, but the building was utterly in ruins—its columns cracked—its tower hurled from its place—its ponderous roof laid low. It was a mournful spectacle, and a terrible proof of the divine wrath and vengeance. Yes, my brethren, the temple of the Lord has been profaned, and it will be rased to the ground. It has been the scene of abomination and impiety, and must be purified by fire. Theft, murder, sacrilege, and every other crime has been committed within its walls, and its destruction will follow. The ministers of heaven’s vengeance are even now hovering above it. Repent, therefore, ye who listen to me, and repent speedily; for sudden death, plague, fire, and famine are at hand. As the prophet Amos saith, ‘The Lord will send a fire, the Lord will commission a fire, the Lord will kindle a fire;’ and the fire so commissioned and so kindled, shall consume you and your city; nor shall one stone of those walls be left standing on another. Repent or burn, for he cometh to judge the earth. Repent or burn, I say!”

As soon as he concluded, Leonard Holt ran up the steps of the portico.

“Solomon Eagle is right,” he cried, in a loud voice; “the vengeance of heaven will descend upon this fabric, since it continues to be the scene of so much wickedness. Even now, it forms the retreat of a profligate nobleman, who has this night forcibly carried off the daughter of a citizen.”

“What nobleman?” cried a bystander.

“The Earl of Rochester,” replied Leonard. “He has robbed Stephen Bloundel, the grocer of Woodstreet, of his daughter, and has concealed her, to avoid pursuit, in the vaults of the cathedral.”

“I know Mr. Bloundel well,” rejoined the man who had made the inquiry, and whom Leonard recognized as a hosier named Lamplugh, “and I know the person who addresses us. It is his apprentice. We must restore the damsel to her father, friends.”

“Agreed,” cried several voices.

“Knock at the door,” cried a man, whose occupation of a smith was proclaimed by his leathern apron, brawny chest, and smoke-begrimed visage, as well as by the heavy hammer which he bore upon his shoulder. “If it is not instantly opened, we will break it down. I have an implement here which will soon do the business!”

A rush was then made to the portal, which rang with the heavy blows dealt against it. While this was passing, Solomon Eagle, whose excitement was increased by the tumult, planted himself in the centre of the colonnade, and shaking his clenched hands at the mob, vociferated—“Repent, or burn!—repent, or burn!”

The crowd continued to batter the door until they were checked by Lamplugh, who declared he heard some one approaching, and the next moment, the voice of one of the vergers inquired in trembling tones who they were, and what they wanted.

“No matter who we are,” replied Leonard—“we demand admittance to search for a young female who has been taken from her home by the Earl of Rochester, and is now concealed within the vaults of the cathedral.”

“If admittance is refused us, we will soon let ourselves in,” vociferated Lamplugh.

“Aye, that we will,” added the smith.

“You are mistaken, friends,” returned the verger, timorously. “The Earl of Rochester is not here.”

“We will not take your word for it,” rejoined the smith. “This will show you we are not to be trifled with.”

So saying, he raised his hammer, and struck such a tremendous blow against the door, that the bolts started in their sockets.

"Hold, hold!" cried the verger, "sooner than violence shall be committed, I will risk your admission."

And he unfastened the door.

"Keep together," shouted the smith, stretching out his arms to oppose the progress of the crowd. "Keep together, I say."

"Ay, ay, keep together," added Lamplugh, seconding his efforts.

"Conduct us to the Earl of Rochester, and no harm shall befall you," cried Leonard, seizing the verger by the collar.

"I tell you I know nothing about him," replied the man. "He is not here."

"It is false! you are bribed to silence," rejoined the apprentice. "We will search till we find him."

"Search where you please," rejoined the verger; "and if you do find him, do what you please with me."

"Don't be afraid of that, friend," replied the smith; "we will hang you and the Earl to the same pillar."

By this time, the crowd had pushed aside the opposition offered by the smith and Lamplugh. Solomon Eagle darted along the nave with lightning swiftness, and mounting the steps leading to the choir, disappeared from view. Some few persons followed him, while others took their course along the aisles; but the majority kept near the apprentice.

Snatching the lantern from the grasp of the verger, Leonard Holt ran on with his companions till they came to a small chapel built by Thomas Kempe, Bishop of London. The door was open, and the apprentice, holding the light forward, perceived there were persons inside. He was about to enter the chapel, when a small spaniel rushed forth, and, barking furiously, held him in check for a moment. Alarmed by the noise, an old man in a tattered garb, and a young female, who were slumbering on benches in the chapel, immediately started to their feet, and advanced towards them.

"We are mistaken," said Lamplugh, "this is only Mike Macascree, the blind piper, and his daughter Nizza. I know them well enough."

Leonard was about to proceed with his search, but a slight circumstance detained him for a few minutes; and during which time he had sufficient leisure to note the extraordinary personal attractions of Nizza Macascree.

In age, she appeared about seventeen, and differed in the character of her beauty, as well as in the natural gracefulness of her carriage and demeanour, from most persons in her humble condition of life. Her features were small, and of the utmost delicacy. She had a charmingly-formed nose—slightly retroussée—a small mouth, garnished with pearl-like teeth, and lips as fresh and ruddy as the dew steeped rose. Her skin was as dark as a gipsy's, but clear and transparent, and far more attractive than the fairest complexion. Her eyes were luminous as the stars, and black as midnight; while her raven tresses, gathered beneath a spotted kerchief tied round her head, escaped in many a wanton curl down her shoulders. Her figure was slight, but exquisitely proportioned; and she had the smallest foot and ankle that ever fell to the lot of woman. Her attire was far from unbecoming, though of the coarsest material; and her fairy feet were set off by the daintiest shoes and hose. Such was the singular and captivating creature that attracted the apprentice's attention.

Her father, Mike Macascree, was upwards of sixty, but still in the full vigour of life, with features which, though not ill-looking, bore no particular resemblance to those of his daughter. He had a good-humoured, jovial countenance, the mirthful expression of which even his sightless orbs could not destroy. Long white locks descended upon his shoulders, and a patriarchal beard adorned his chin. He was wrapped in a loose grey gown, patched with different coloured cloths, and supported himself with a staff. His pipe was suspended from his neck by a green worsted cord.

"Lie down, Bell," he cried to his dog: "what are you barking at thus? Lie down, I say."

"Something is the matter, father," replied Nizza. "The church is full of people."

"Indeed!" exclaimed the piper.

"We are sorry to disturb you," said Leonard. "But we are in search of a nobleman who has run away with a citizen's daughter, and conveyed her to the cathedral and we thought they might have taken refuge in this chapel."

"No one is here except myself and daughter," replied the piper. "We are allowed this lodging by Mr. Quatremain, the minor canon."

"All dogs are ordered to be destroyed by the Lord Mayor?" cried the smith, seizing Bell by the neck. "This noisy animal must be silenced."

"Oh no! do not hurt her," cried Nizza. "My father loves poor Bell almost as well as he loves me. She is necessary to his existence. You must not—will not destroy her!"

"Won't I!" replied the smith, gruffly;—"we'll see that."

"But we are not afraid of contagion, are we, father?" cried Nizza, appealing to the piper.

"Not in the least," replied Mike, "and we will take care the poor beast touches no one else. Do not harm her, sir—for pity's sake do not. I should miss her sadly."

"The Lord Mayor's commands must be obeyed," rejoined the smith, brutally.

As if conscious of the fate awaiting her, poor Bell struggled hard to get free, and uttered a piteous yell.

"You are not going to kill the dog?" interposed Leonard.

"Have you anything to say to the contrary?" rejoined the smith, in a tone calculated, as he thought, to put an end to further interference.

"Only this," replied Leonard, "that I will not allow it."

"You won't—eh!" returned the smith, derisively.

"I will not," rejoined Leonard, "so put her down, and come along."

"Go your own way," replied the smith, "and leave me to mine."

Leonard answered by snatching Bell suddenly from his grasp. Thus liberated, the terrified animal instantly flew to her mistress.

"Is this the return I get for assisting you?" cried the smith, savagely. "You are bewitched by a pair of black eyes. But you will repent what you have done."

"You will not repent it, I am sure," replied Nizza, clasping Bell to her bosom, and looking gratefully at the apprentice; "I shall never forget your kindness. You say you are in search of a citizen's daughter and a nobleman," she continued. "About half an hour ago, or scarcely so much, I was awakened by the opening of the door of the southern transept, and peeping out, I saw three persons—a young man in the dress of a watchman, but evidently disguised, and a very beautiful young woman, conducted by a middle-aged female, bearing a lantern—pass through the door-way leading to Saint Faith's. Perhaps, they are the very persons you are in search of."

"They are," returned Leonard; "and you have more than repaid me for the slight service I have rendered you by the information. We will instantly repair to the vaults. Come along, friends."

So saying, and accompanied by the whole of the assemblage, except the smith, who turned to depart, he set off, and, passing through the low doorway on the right of the choir, descended to Saint Faith's. He found the subterranean church buried in profound darkness, and apparently wholly untenanted. They searched every corner of it, but ineffectually. At length, they arrived at the charnel, and, crossing it, reached the door of the vault formerly occupied by the sexton. It was fastened, but, Leonard knocking violently against it, it was soon opened by Judith Malmayns, who appeared much surprised, and not a little alarmed, at the sight of so many persons. She was not alone, and her companion was Chowles, who was seated at a table, on which stood a flask of wine and a couple of glasses. The coffin-maker appeared a good deal confused at being caught in such a situation, though he endeavoured to cover his embarrassment by an air of effrontery.

"Where is the Earl of Rochester—where is Amabel?" demanded Leonard Holt.

"I know nothing about either of them," replied Judith. "Why do you put these questions to me?"

"Because you admitted them to the cathedral," cried the apprentice, furiously; "and because you have concealed them. If you do not instantly guide me to their retreat, I will make you a terrible example to all such evil-doers in future."

"I know not why you threaten me thus," replied Judith; "but if you think to frighten me, you are mistaken. Mr. Chowles has been here more than two hours. Ask him whether he has seen any one."

"I have certainly seen no one," asserted Chowles. "There is no Amabel—no Earl of Rochester, here. You must be dreaming, young man."

"The piper's daughter affirmed the contrary," replied Leonard. "She said she saw Mrs. Malmayns admit the Earl and Amabel."

"She lies," replied Judith fiercely. But suddenly altering her tone, she continued, "If I had admitted them, you would find them here."

Leonard looked around uneasily. He was but half convinced, and yet he scarcely knew what to think.

"If you doubt what I say to you," continued Judith, "I will take you to every chamber in the cathedral. You will then be satisfied that I speak the truth. But I will not have this mob with me. Your companions must remain here."

"Ha!" cried Leonard.

"What! are you afraid of a woman?" said Judith, contemptuously.

"You will await my return here, friends," said Leonard to the others.

"Ay, stop with me and make yourselves comfortable," cried Chowles. "You are not so much used to these places as I am. I prefer a snug crypt like this to the best room in a tavern—ha! ha!"

Attended by Judith, Leonard Holt visited every chapel and chamber within the subterranean church, but without success. They then ascended to the upper structure, and searched the choir, the transepts, and the nave, but with no better result.

"If you still think they are here," remarked Judith, "we will mount to the summit of the tower."

"I will never quit the cathedral without them," replied Leonard.

"Come on, then," returned Judith.

So saying, she opened a door in the wall on the left of the choir, and, ascending a winding stone staircase, presently arrived at a small chamber, and desired Leonard to search it. The apprentice unsuspectingly obeyed. But he had scarcely set foot within the room, when the door was locked behind him, and he was made aware of the treachery practised upon him by a peal of mocking laughter from his conductress.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE INTERRUPTED MARRIAGE.

AFTER repeated, but ineffectual efforts to burst open the door, Leonard gave up the attempt in despair, and endeavoured to make known his situation by loud outcries. But his shouts, if heard, were unheeded, and he was soon compelled from exhaustion to desist. Judith having carried away the lantern, he was left in total darkness; but on searching the chamber, which proved to be a sort of cell, about four feet wide, and six deep, and apparently contrived in the thickness of the wall, he discovered a narrow grated loop-hole. By dint of great exertion, and with the help of his sword, which snapped in twain as he used it, he managed to force off one of the rusty bars, and to squeeze himself through the aperture. But all his labour was thrown away. The loop-hole opened on the south side of the tower, near one of the large buttresses, which projected several yards beyond it on the left, and was more than forty feet above the roof; so that it would be certain destruction to drop from so great a height.

The night was overcast, and the moon hidden behind thick clouds. Still, there was light enough to enable him to discern the perilous position in which he stood. After gazing below for some time, Leonard was about to return to the chamber, when, casting his eyes upwards, he thought he perceived the end of a rope about a foot above his head, hanging from the upper part of the structure. No sooner was the discovery made, than it occurred to him that he might possibly liberate himself by this unlooked for aid; and, regardless of the risk he ran, he sprang upwards and caught hold of the rope. It was firmly fastened above, and sustained his weight well.

Possessed of considerable bodily strength and great activity, and nerved by desperation, Leonard Holt placed his feet against the buttress, and impelled himself towards one of the tall pointed windows lighting the interior of the tower; but though he reached the point at which he aimed, the sway of the rope dragged him back before he could obtain a secure grasp of it; and, after another ineffectual effort, fearful of exhausting his strength, he abandoned the attempt, and began to climb up the rope with his hands and knees, in the hope of reaching the belfry. Aided by the inequalities and other slight projections of the roughened walls, he soon arrived at a range of small Saxon arches ornamenting the tower immediately beneath the place he was trying to reach, and succeeding in planting his right foot on the moulding of one of those arches, he instantly steadied himself, and with little further effort clambered through an open window into the belfry.

His first act was to drop on his knees, and return thanks to Heaven for his deliverance. He then looked about for an outlet; but, though there was a winding staircase in each of the four angles of the tower, all the doors, to his infinite disappointment, were fastened on the other side. He was still, therefore, a prisoner.

Determined, however, not to yield to despair, he continued his search, and finding a door opening upon a small staircase, communicating with the summit of the tower, he unfastened it (for the bolt was on his own side), and hurried up the steps. Passing through another door, bolted like the first within side, he issued upon the roof of the tower. He was now on the highest part of the structure, and further from his hopes than ever, and so agonizing were his feelings, that he almost felt tempted to fling himself to the ground. Beneath him lay the body of the cathedral, its vast roof, its crocketed pinnacles, its buttresses and battlements, scarcely discernible through the gloom, looking like some monstrous engine devised to torture him.

Wearied with gazing at it, and convinced of the futility of any further attempt to descend, Leonard Holt returned to the belfry, and throwing himself on the floor sought some repose. The fatigue he had undergone was so great, that, notwithstanding his anxiety, he soon dropped asleep, and did not awake for several hours. On opening his eyes, it was just getting light, and shaking himself, he again prepared for action. All the events of the night rushed upon his recollection, and he thought, with a feeling of unutterable anguish, of Amabel's situation. Glancing round the room, it occurred to him that he might give the alarm by ringing the enormous bells near him; but though he set them slightly in motion, he could not agitate the immense clappers sufficiently to produce any sound.

Resolved, however, to free himself at any hazard, he once more repaired to the summit of the tower, and leaning over the low stone balustrade, gazed below. It was a sublime spectacle, and, in spite of his distress, filled him with admiration and astonishment. He had stationed himself on the south side of the tower, and immediately beneath him lay the broad roof of the transept, shooting out to a distance of nearly two hundred feet. On the right, surrounded by a double row of cloisters, remarkable for the beauty of their architecture, stood the convocation, or chapter house. This exquisite building was octagonal in form, and supported by large buttresses, ornamented on each gradation by crocketed pinnacles. Each side, moreover, had a large pointed window, filled with stained glass, and was richly adorned with trefoils and cinquefoils. Further on, on the same side, was the small low church of Saint Gregory's, overtopped by the south-western tower of the mightier parent fane.

But it was not the cathedral itself, but the magnificent view it commanded, that chiefly attracted the apprentice's attention. From the elevated point on which he stood, his eye ranged along a vast tract of country bounded by the Surrey hills, and at last settled upon the river, which in some parts was obscured by a light haze, and in others tinged with the ruddy beams of the newly-risen sun. Its surface was spotted, even at this early hour, with craft, while innumerable vessels, of all shapes and sizes, were moored to its banks. On the left, he noted the tall houses covering London Bridge; and on the right traced the sweeping course of the stream as it flowed from Westminster. On this hand, on the opposite bank, were the flat marshes of Lambeth; while nearer were the old bull-baiting and bear-baiting establishments, the flags above which could be discerned over the tops of the surrounding habitations. Opposite him lay the borough of Southwark, even then a large and populous district, the two most prominent features in the scene being Winchester House, and the old and beautiful church of Saint Saviour's.

Filled with wonder at what he saw, Leonard turned towards the east, and here an extraordinary prospect met his gaze. The whole of the city of London was spread out like a map before him—and presented a dense mass of ancient houses, with twisted chimneys, gables, and picturesque roofs—here and there overtopped by a hall, a college, a hospital, or some other loftier structure. This vast collection of buildings was girded in by grey and mouldering walls, approached by seven gates, and intersected by innumerable narrow streets. The spires and towers of the churches shot up into the clear morning air,—for, except in a very few instances, no smoke yet issued from the chimneys. On this side, the view of the city was terminated by the fortifications and keep of the Tower.

Little did the apprentice think, when he looked at the magnificent scene before him, and marvelled at the countless number of buildings he beheld, that, ere eighteen months had elapsed, the whole mass, together with the mighty fabric on which he stood, would be swept away by a tremendous conflagration. Unable to foresee this direful event, and lamenting only that so fair a city should be a prey to an exterminating pestilence, he turned towards the north, and suffered his gaze to wander over Finsbury fields and the hilly ground beyond them—over Smithfield and Clerkenwell, and the beautiful open country adjoining Gray's-inn-lane.

So smiling and beautiful did these districts appear that he could scarcely fancy they were the chief haunts of the horrible distemper. But he could not blind himself to the fact that in Finsbury-fields, as well as in the open country to the north of Holborn, plague-pits had been digged, and pest-houses erected; and this consideration threw such a gloom over the prospect, that, changing the scene, he looked towards the west. Here his view embraced all the proudest mansions of the capital, and tracing the Strand to Charing-cross, long since robbed of the beautiful structure from which it derived its name, and noticing its numerous noble habitations, his eye finally rested upon Whitehall; and he heaved a sigh as he thought that the palace of the sovereign was infected by as foul a moral taint as the hideous disease that ravaged the dwellings of his subjects.

At the time Leonard Holt gazed upon the capital, its picturesque beauties were nearly at their close. In less than a year and a half afterwards, as has been just intimated, the greater part of the old city was destroyed by fire; and though it was rebuilt, and in many respects improved, its original and picturesque character was not restored.

It seems scarcely possible to conceive a finer view than can be gained from the dome of the modern cathedral at sunrise on a May morning, when the prospect is not obscured by the smoke of ten thousand chimneys,—when the river is just beginning to stir with its numerous craft, or when they are at least sleeping on its glistening bosom,—when every individual house, court, church, square, or theatre, can be discerned,—when the eye can range over the whole city on each side, and calculate its vast extent. It seems scarcely possible, we say, to suppose that at any previous time it could have been more striking,—and yet, at the period under consideration, it was infinitely more so.

Then, every house was picturesque, and every street a collection of picturesque objects. Then, that which was objectionable in itself and contributed to the insalubrity of the city, namely, the extreme narrowness of the streets, and overhanging stories of the houses, was one grand source of their beauty. Then, the huge projecting signs with their fantastical iron-work—the conduits—the crosses (where crosses remained)—the maypoles—all were picturesque; and as superior to what is now presented to the view, as the attire of Elizabeth's age is to the ugly and disfiguring costume of our own day.

Satiated with this glorious prospect, Leonard began to recur to his own situation, and carefully scrutinizing every available point on the side of the tower, he thought it possible to effect his descent by clambering down the gradations of one of the buttresses. But still, as the experiment would be attended with the greatest danger, while even if he reached the roof, he would be far from his object, he resolved to defer it for a short time, in the hope that ere long some of the bell-ringers, or other persons connected with the cathedral, might visit his place of captivity, and set him free.

While thus communing with himself, he heard a door open in the belfry, and hurrying down the stairs at the sound, beheld, to his great surprise and joy, the piper's daughter, Nizza Macascree.

"You have delivered me from captivity," he cried.

"I have searched for you everywhere," she answered, "and began to think some ill had happened to you. I overheard Mrs. Malmayns say she had shut you up in the cell in the upper part of the tower. How did you escape thence?"

Leonard hastily explained.

"I told you I should never forget the service you rendered me in preserving the life of poor Bell," pursued Nizza, "and what I have done will prove I am not unmindful of my promise. I saw you search the cathedral last night with Mrs. Malmayns, and noticed that she returned from the tower without you. At first, I supposed you might have left the cathedral without my observing you, and I was confirmed in my opinion by what I subsequently heard."

"Indeed!" exclaimed Leonard. "What did you hear?"

"I followed Mrs. Malmayns to the vaults of Saint Faith's," replied Nizza, "and heard her inform your companions that you had found the grocer's daughter, and had left, taking her away."

"And this false statement imposed upon you?" cried Leonard.

"It imposed upon the others as well as me," replied Nizza. "They were by this time more than half intoxicated with the brandy given them—no doubt with an ill design—by Chowles, the coffin-maker, and they departed, venting imprecations upon you."

Leonard could not repress an exclamation of anger.

"They had not been gone many minutes," pursued Nizza, "when, having stationed myself behind one of the pillars in the north aisle of Saint Faith's,—for I suspected something was wrong—I observed Mrs. Malmayns and Chowles steal across the nave, and proceed towards the vestry. The former tapped at the door, and they were instantly admitted by Mr. Quatremain, the minor canon. Hastening to the door, which was left slightly ajar, I perceived through the chinks two young gallants, whom I heard addressed as the Earl of Rochester and Sir George Etherege, and a young female, whom I could not doubt was Amabel. The Earl and his companion laughed heartily at the trick Mrs. Malmayns had played you, which she detailed to them. Amabel, however, took no part in their merriment, but, on the contrary, looked very grave, and even wept."

"Wept, did she?" cried Leonard, in a voice of much emotion. "Then there is hope for her yet."

"You appear greatly interested in her," observed Nizza, pausing in her narration. "Do you love her?"

"Can you ask it?" cried Leonard, passionately.

"I would advise you to think no more of her, and to fix your heart elsewhere," returned Nizza.

"You know not what it is to love," rejoined the apprentice, "or you would not offer such advice."

"Perhaps not," replied Nizza; "but I am sorry you have bestowed your heart upon one who so little appreciates the boon."

And feeling she had said too much, she blushed deeply, and cast down her eyes.

Unconscious of her confusion, and entirely engrossed by the thought of his mistress, Leonard urged her to proceed.

"Tell me what has become of Amabel—where I shall find her?" he cried.

"You will find her soon enough," replied Nizza. "She has not left the cathedral. But hear me to an end. On learning you were made a prisoner, I ran to the door leading to the tower, but found that Mrs. Malmayns had locked it, and removed the key. Not daring to give the alarm,—for I had gathered from what was said that all the three vergers were in the Earl's pay,—I determined to await a favourable opportunity to release you. Accordingly, I returned to the vestry-door, and again played the eaves-dropper. Amabel by this time had become greatly dejected, and insisted upon being taken back to her father. Nothing that the Earl said could soothe her, until at last he promised to wed her at daybreak."

"At daybreak!—that is now," cried Leonard—"the marriage must be prevented."

"There is plenty of time," replied Nizza; "it will not take place for half an hour."

"How do you know that?" cried Leonard.

"Because it was appointed for six o'clock," replied Nizza,—"but I need scarcely tell you it will be a mock ceremonial."

"In any case it must be prevented," replied Leonard. "Her father would never consent to the marriage, nor will I permit it. But what followed this arrangement?"

"You shall hear," returned Nizza. "Amabel was scarcely pacified, when a person entered the cathedral, who was addressed as Major Pillichody, and who I found had been employed in the poor girl's abduction. He informed the Earl that Mr. Bloundel was in the greatest distress at his daughter's disappearance, and advised him to lose no time in conveying her to some secure retreat. These tidings renewed Amabel's distress, and the Earl could only restore her to tranquillity by promising that as soon as the marriage was celebrated, he would take her home, and introduce her in the character of his countess to her parents."

"Go on," said Leonard, breathlessly.

"I have little more to tell," returned Nizza, "except that she consented to this proposal, on condition that she was allowed to remain, till the hour of her marriage, with Mrs. Malmayns."

"Bad as that alternative is, it is better than the other," observed Leonard. "But how did you procure the key of the winding staircase?"

"I fortunately observed where Mrs. Malmayns placed it," replied Nizza, "and when she had departed to the crypt near the charnel, with Amabel, I possessed myself of it. For some time I was unable to use it, because the Earl of Rochester and Sir George Etherege were pacing to and fro in front of the door, and their discourse confirmed me that the marriage was meant to be a feigned one, for Sir George remonstrated with the Earl as to the step he was about to take, but the other only laughed at his scruples. As soon as they retired, which is not more than half an hour ago, I unlocked the door, and hurried up the winding stairs. I searched every chamber, and began to think you were gone, or that Mrs. Malmayns' statement respecting you was false. But I resolved to continue my search until I was fully satisfied on this point. Accordingly, I ascended to the belfry, and you are aware of the result."

"You have rendered me the greatest possible service," replied Leonard, "and I hope hereafter to prove my gratitude. But let us now descend to the choir, where I will conceal myself till Amabel appears."

Before quitting the belfry, Leonard chanced to cast his eyes on a stout staff, left there either by one of the bell-ringers or some accidental visitant, and grasping it as an unlooked-for prize, he hastened down the steps, followed by the piper's daughter.

On opening the lowest door, he glanced towards the choir, and there, before the high altar, stood Quatremain, in his surplice, with the Earl and Amabel, attended by Etherege and Pillichody. The ceremonial had just commenced. Not a moment was to be lost. Grasping his staff, the apprentice darted along the nave, and rushing towards the pair, exclaimed in a loud voice, "Hold! I forbid this marriage. It must not take place!"

"Back, sirrah!" cried Etherege, drawing his sword, and opposing the approach of the apprentice. "You have no authority to interrupt it. Proceed with the ceremony, Mr. Quatremain."

"Forbear!" cried a voice of thunder behind them—and all turning at the cry, they beheld the figure of Solomon Eagle, with his brasier on his brow, issue from behind the stalls. "Forbear!" roared the enthusiast, rushing up to them, and placing himself between the Earl and Amabel, both of whom recoiled at his appearance. "Heaven's altar must not be profaned with these mockeries! And you, Thomas Quatremain, who have taken part in this unrighteous transaction, make clean your breast, and purge yourself quickly of your sins, for your hours are numbered. You are smitten by the pestilence."

CHAPTER XVII.

PAUL'S WALK.

It will now be necessary to ascertain what took place at the grocer's habitation subsequently to Amabel's abduction. Leonard Holt having departed, Pillichody was preparing to make good his retreat, when he was prevented by Blaize, who, hearing a noise in the yard, peeped cautiously out of the back-door, and inquired who was there?

"Are you Mr. Bloundel?" rejoined Pillichody, bethinking him of a plan to turn the tables upon the apprentice.

"No; I am his porter," replied the other.

"What, Blaize!" replied Pillichody. "Thunder and lightning! don't you remember Barnard Boute-feu, the watchman?"

"I don't remember any watchman of that name, and I cannot discern your features," rejoined Blaize. "But your voice sounds familiar to me. What are you doing there?"

"I have been trying to prevent Leonard Holt from carrying off your master's daughter, the fair Mistress Amabel," answered Pillichody. "But he has accomplished his villanous purpose in spite of me."

"The devil he has!" cried Blaize. "Here is a pretty piece of news for my master. But how did you discover the rascal?"

"Chancing to pass along the entry on the other side of that wall, about a quarter of an hour ago," returned Pillichody, "I perceived a rope ladder fastened to it, and wishing to ascertain what was the matter, I mounted it, and had scarcely set foot in the yard, when I saw two persons advancing. They did not notice me, but I soon gathered from their discourse who they were, and what was their design. I allowed Amabel to cross the wall, but just as the apprentice was about to follow, I laid hold of the skirt of his doublet, and, pulling him back, desired him to come with me to his master. He answered by drawing a sword, and would have whipped it through my body, but I closed with him, and should soon have secured him, if my foot had not slipped. While I was on the ground, he dealt me a severe blow, and ran after his mistress."

"Just like him," replied Blaize. "He took the same cowardly advantage of me last night."

"No punishment will be too severe for him," cried Pillichody, "and I hope Mr. Bloundel will make an example of him."

"How fortunate I was not gone to bed!" exclaimed Blaize. "I had just taken a couple of refusals, and was about to put on my nightcap, when hearing a noise without, and being ever on the alert to defend my master's property, even at the hazard of my life, I stepped forth, and found you."

"I will bear testimony to your vigilance and courage," returned Pillichody; "but you had better go and give the alarm. I will wait here."

"Instantly!—instantly!" cried Blaize, rushing up stairs.

On the way to Mr. Bloundel's chamber, he met Patience, and told her what he had heard. She was inclined to put a very different construction on the affair, but as she bore the apprentice no particular good-will, she determined to keep her opinion to herself, and let things take their course. The grocer was soon aroused, and scarcely able to credit the porter's intelligence, and yet fearing something must be wrong, he hastily attired himself, and proceeded to Amabel's room. It was empty, and it was evident from the state in which everything was left, that she had never retired to rest. Casting a troubled glance round the room, Bloundel then hurried down stairs in search of the apprentice, but he was nowhere to be found. By this time, Mrs. Bloundel had joined him, and on hearing Blaize's story, utterly scouted it.

"It cannot be," she cried. "Leonard Holt could have no motive for acting thus. He had our consent to the union, and the sole obstacle to it was Amabel herself. Is it likely he would run away with her?"

"I am sure I do not know," replied Patience, "but he was desperately in love, that's certain, and when people are so, I am told they do very strange and unaccountable things. Perhaps, he may have carried her off against her will."

"Very likely," rejoined Blaize. "I thought I heard a scream, and should have called out at the moment, but a rufus stuck in my throat and prevented me."

"Where is the person who says he intercepted them?" asked Bloundel.

"In the yard," answered Blaize.

"Bid him come hither," rejoined his master. "Stay, I will go to him myself."

With this, the whole party, which was now increased by old Josyna and Stephen,—the two boys, and little Christiana, not having been disturbed,—proceeded to the yard, where they found Pillichody in his watchman's dress, who related his story more circumstantially.

"I don't believe a word of it," cried Mrs. Bloundel; "and I will stake my life it is a trick played by the Earl of Rochester."

"Were I assured of that," said the grocer, in a stern whisper, to his wife, "I would stir no further in the matter. My threat to Amabel was not an idle one."

"Perhaps, I am mistaken," returned Mrs. Bloundel, seized with a new anxiety. "Don't mind what I say. Judge for yourself. Oh dear! what will become of her!" she mentally ejaculated.

"Lanterns and links!" cried Pillichody, "do you mean to impeach my veracity, good mistress? I am an old soldier, and as tenacious of my honour, as your husband is of his credit."

"This blustering will not serve your turn, fellow," observed the grocer, seizing him by the collar. "I begin to suspect my wife is in the right, and will at all events detain you."

"Detain me! on what ground?" asked Pillichody.

"As an accomplice in my daughter's abduction," replied Bloundel. "Here, Blaize—Stephen, hold him while I call the watch. This is a most mysterious affair, but I will soon get at the bottom of it."

"I am a watchman myself, I tell you," said Pillichody. "Treat me courteously. I shall offer no resistance."

By the grocer's directions, Pillichody, who very quietly entered the house, and surrendered his halbert to Blaize, was taken to the kitchen. Bloundel then set forth, leaving Stephen on guard at the yard door, while his wife, who was in a state almost of distraction, remained in the shop, awaiting his return.

On reaching the kitchen with the prisoner, Blaize besought his mother, who, as well as Patience, had accompanied him thither, to fetch a bottle of sack. While she went for the wine, and the porter was stalking to and fro before the door with the halberd on his shoulder, Patience whispered in the ears of Pillichody, "I know who you are. You came here last night with the Earl of Rochester in the disguise of a quack doctor."

"Hush!" cried Pillichody, laying his finger on his lips.

"I am not going to betray you," returned Patience, in the same tone. "But you had better make your escape while you can. I won't answer for your life if Mr. Bloundel finds you out."

"I won't lose a moment," replied Pillichody, starting to his feet.

"What's the matter," cried Blaize, suddenly halting.

"I only got up to see whether the wine was coming," replied Pillichody.

"Yes, here it is," replied Blaize, as his mother reappeared; "and now you shall have a glass of such sack as you never yet tasted."

And pouring out a bumper, he offered it to Pillichody. The latter took the glass; but his hand shook so violently, that he could not raise it to his lips.

"What ails you, friend?" inquired Blaize, uneasily.

"I don't know," replied Pillichody; "but I feel extremely unwell."

"He looks to me as if he had got the plague," observed Patience to Blaize.

"The plague!" exclaimed the latter, letting fall the glass, which shivered in pieces on the stone floor,— "and I have touched him. Where is the vinegar-bottle? I must sprinkle myself directly, and rub myself from head to foot with oil of hartshorn and spirits of sulphur. Mother! dear mother! you have taken away my medicine-chest. If you love me, go and fetch me a little conserve of Roman wormwood and mithridate. You will find them in two small jars."

"Oh, yes, do," cried Patience, "or there is no saying what may happen."

Moved by their joint entreaties, old Josyna again departed; and her back was no sooner turned, than Patience said in an undertone to Pillichody.—"Now is your time. You have not a moment to lose."

Instantly taking the hint, the other uttered a loud cry, and springing up, caught at Blaize, who dropped the halbert, and fled into one corner of the room.

Pillichody then hurried up stairs, while Blaize shouted after him, "Don't touch him, Master Stephen. He has got the plague! He has got the plague!"

Alarmed by this outcry, Stephen suffered Pillichody to pass; and the latter, darting across the yard, mounted the rope-ladder, and quickly disappeared. A few minutes afterwards, Bloundel returned with the watch, and was greatly enraged when he found that the prisoner had got off. No longer doubting that he had been robbed of his daughter by the Earl of Rochester, he still could not make up his mind to abandon her, and his conflicting feelings occasioned him a night of greater anxiety than he had ever before experienced. The party of watch whom he had summoned searched the street for him, and endeavoured to trace out the fugitives—but without success: and they returned before daybreak to report their failure.

About six o'clock, Mr. Bloundel, unable to restrain himself longer, sallied forth with Blaize in search of his daughter and Leonard. Uncertain where to bend his steps, he trusted to chance to direct him, resolved, if he was unsuccessful, to lay a complaint before the King. Proceeding along Cheapside, he entered Paternoster Row, and traversed it till he came to Paul's Alley,—a narrow passage leading to the north-west corner of the cathedral. Prompted by an unaccountable impulse, he no sooner caught sight of the reverend structure, than determining to seek admittance to it, he walked up to the great western gateway, and knocked against it.

We shall, however, precede him, and return to the party at the altar. The awful warning of Solomon Eagle so alarmed Quatremain that he let fall his prayer-book, and after gazing vacantly round for a few moments, staggered to one of the stalls, where feeling a burning pain in his breast, he tore open his doublet, and found that the enthusiast had spoken the truth, and that he was really attacked by the pestilence. As to Amabel, on hearing the terrible denunciation, she uttered a loud cry, and would have fallen to the ground, but for the timely assistance of the apprentice, who caught her with one arm, while, with the other, he defended himself against the Earl and his companions.

But, in spite of his resistance, they would have soon compelled him to relinquish his charge, if Solomon Eagle, who had hitherto contented himself with gazing sternly on at what was passing, had not interfered. Rushing towards the combatants, he seized Rochester and Etherege, and hurled them backwards with almost supernatural force. When they arose, and menaced him with their swords, he laughed loudly and contemptuously, crying, "Advance, if ye dare! and try your strength against one armed by Heaven, and ye shall find how far it will prevail."

At this juncture, Leonard Holt heard a musical voice behind him, and turning, beheld Nizza Macascree. She beckoned him to follow her; and raising Amabel in his arms, he ran towards the door leading to Saint Faith's, through which the piper's daughter passed. All this was the work of a moment, and when the Earl and Etherege rushed after him, and tried the door, they found it, to their great discomfiture, fastened withinside.

Just then, a loud knocking was heard at the northern entrance of the cathedral, and a verger answering the summons, Mr. Bloundel and Blaize were admitted. On beholding the new-comers, Rochester and his companions were filled with confusion. Equally astonished at the rencontre, the grocer grasped his staff, and rushing up to the Earl, demanded, in a voice that made the other, despite his natural audacity, quail,— "Where is my child? What have you done with her, villain?"

"I know nothing about her," replied Rochester, with affected carelessness. "Yes, I am wrong," he added, as if recollecting himself, "I am told she has run away with your apprentice."

Pillichody, who had changed his attire since he last appeared before the grocer, thought he might now venture to address him without fear of discovery, and setting his arms akimbo, and assuming a swaggering demeanour, he strutted forward and said, "Your daughter has just been wedded to Leonard Holt, Mr. Bloundel."

"It is false," cried Bloundel,—“as false as the character you just personated, for I recognize you as the knave who recently appeared before me as a watchman.”

"I pledge you my word as a nobleman," said Rochester, "that your daughter has just descended to Saint Faith's with your apprentice."

"I can corroborate your lordship's assertion," said Etherege.

"And I," added Pillichody. "By the coffers of the rich widow of Watling-street! it is so!"

"To convince you that we speak the truth, we will go with you, and assist you to look for her," said Rochester.

Attaching little credit to what he heard, and yet unwilling to lose a chance of recovering his daughter, the grocer hastened to the door pointed out by his informants, but found it fastened.

"You had better go to the main entrance," said one of the vergers. "I have the keys with me, and will admit you."

"I will keep guard here till you return," said another verger.

Accompanied by Rochester and Etherege, Bloundel then proceeded to the chief door of the subterranean church. It was situated at the south of the cathedral between two of the larger buttresses, and at the foot of a flight of stone steps. On reaching it, the verger produced the keys, but they were of no avail, for the door was barred withinside. After many fruitless attempts to obtain admission, they were fain to give up the attempt.

"Well, if we cannot get in, no one shall get out," observed the verger. "The only key that opens this door is in my possession, so we have them safe enough."

The party then returned to the cathedral, where they found Blaize, Pillichody, and the two other vergers, keeping watch at the door near the choir. No one had attempted to come forth.

"What do you mean to do, Mr. Bloundel?" asked the Earl.

"Keep watch till they appear," replied the grocer.

Rochester then walked apart with his companions, while Bloundel, feeling secure so long as he kept the Earl in view, folded his arms upon his breast, and determined to wait the result.

By this time, the doors being opened, a great crowd was soon collected within the sacred structure. Saint Paul's Churchyard, as is well known, was formerly the great mart for booksellers, who have not, even in later times, deserted the neighbourhood, but still congregate in Paternoster Row, Ave-Maria-Lane, and the adjoining thoroughfares. At the period of this history, they did not confine themselves to the precincts of the cathedral, but, as has been previously intimated, fixed their shops beneath its portico, or against the massive pillars of the nave. Besides booksellers, there were sempstresses, tobacco-merchants, venders of fruit and provisions, and Jews—all of whom had stalls within the cathedral, and who were now making preparations for the business of the day. Shortly afterwards, numbers who came for recreation and amusement made their appearance, and before ten o'clock, Paul's Walk, as the nave was termed, was thronged by apprentices, rufflers, porters, water-carriers, higglers, with baskets on their heads, or under their arms, fish-wives, quack-doctors, cut-purses, bona robas, merchants, lawyers, and serving men, who came to be hired, and who stationed themselves near an oaken block attached to one of the pillars, and which was denominated, from the use it was put to, "the serving man's log." Some of the crowd were smoking, some laughing,—others gathering round a ballad-singer, who was chanting one of Rochester's own licentious songs: some were buying quack medicines and remedies for the plague, the virtues of which the vender loudly extolled—while others were bandying jests with the dames, many of whom were masked. Everything seemed to be going forward within this sacred place, except devotion. Here a man, mounted on the carved marble of a monument, was bellowing forth the news of the Dutch war, while another, not far from him, on a bench, was announcing the number of those who had died on the previous night of the plague. There, at the very font, was a usurer paying over a sum of money to a gallant,—it was Sir Paul Parravicin,—who was sealing a bond for thrice the amount. Here, a party of choristers, attended by a rabble rout, were pursuing another gallant, who had ventured into the cathedral booted and spurred, and were demanding "spur-money" of him—an exaction which they claimed as part of their perquisites.

An admirable picture of this curious scene has been given by Bishop Earle, in his "Microcosmographia," published in 1629. "Paul's Walk," he writes, "is the land's epitome, or you may call it the lesser isle of Great Britain. It is more than this,—it is the whole world's map, which you may here discern in its perfectest motion, jostling and turning. It is a heap of stones and men, with a vast confusion of languages; and were the steeple not sanctified, nothing could be liker Babel. The noise in it is like that of bees, a strange humming, or buzzing, mixed of walking, tongues, and feet:—it is a kind of still roar, or loud whisper. It is the great exchange of all discourse, and no business whatsoever but is here stirring and afoot. It is the synod of all parts politic, jointed and laid together in most serious posture, and they are not half so busy at the Parliament. It is the market of young lecturers, whom you may cheapen here at all rates and sizes. It is the general mint of all famous lies, which are here, like the legends of Popery, first coined and stamped in the church. All inventions are emptied here, and not a few pockets. The best sign of the Temple in it is that it is the thieves' sanctuary, who rob more safely in a crowd than in a wilderness, while every pillar is a bush to hide them. It is the other expense of the day, after plays and taverns, and men have still some oaths left to swear here. The visitants are all men without exceptions; but the principal inhabitants are stale knights and captains out of service, men of long rapiers and short purses, who, after all, turn merchants here, and traffic for news. Some make it a preface to their dinner, and travel for an appetite; but thirstier men make it their ordinary, and board here very cheap. Of all such places it is least haunted by hobgoblins, for if a ghost would walk here, he could not."

Decker, moreover, terms Paul's Walk, or the "Mediterranean Isle," in the "Gull's Hornbook,"—"the only gallery wherein the pictures of all your true fashionable and complimentary gulls are, and ought to be, hung up." After minute directions for the manner of entering the walk, he proceeds thus:—

"Bend your course directly in the middle line, that the whole body of the church may appear to be yours, where in view of all, you may publish your suit in what manner you affect most, either with the slide of your cloak from the one shoulder, or the other." He then recommends the gull, after four turns in the nave, to betake himself to some of the sempstresses' shops, the new tobacco office, or the booksellers' stalls, "where, if you cannot read, exercise your smoke, and inquire who has written against this divine weed."

Such, or something like it, was Paul's Walk at the period of this history.

The grocer, who had not quitted his post, remained a silent and sorrowful spectator of this strange scene. Despite his anxiety, he could not help moralizing upon it, and it furnished him with abundant food for reflection.

As to Rochester and his companions, they mingled with the crowd—though the Earl kept a wary eye on the door—chatted with the prettiest damsels—listened to the newsmongers, and broke their fast at the stall of a vender of provisions, who supplied them with viands and a bottle of excellent wine.

Blaize was soon drawn away by one of the quacks, and, in spite of his master's frowns, he could not help purchasing one of the infallible antidotes against the pestilence offered for sale by the charlatan. Parravicin had no sooner obtained his money from the usurer than he strolled along the nave, and was equally surprised and delighted at meeting with his friends, who briefly explained to him why they were there.

"And how do you expect the adventure to terminate?" asked the Knight, laughing heartily at the recital.

"Heaven knows," replied the Earl. "But what are you doing here?"

"I came partly to replenish my purse, for I have been somewhat unlucky of late," replied Parravicin,

"and partly to see a lovely creature, whom I accidentally discovered here yesterday."

"A new beauty!" cried Rochester. "Who is she?"

"Before I tell you, you must engage not to interfere with me," replied the Knight. "I have marked her for my own."

"Agreed," replied Rochester. "Now, her name?"

"She is the daughter of a blind piper, who haunts the cathedral," returned Parravicin, "and her name is Nizza Macascree. Is it not charming? But you shall see her."

"We must not go too far from the door of Saint Faith's," rejoined Rochester. "If you can find her, bring her hither."

"That is more easily said than done," replied Parravicin. "She is as coy as the grocer's daughter. However, I will try to oblige you."

With this, he quitted his companions, and returning shortly afterwards, said, "My mistress has likewise disappeared. I found the old piper seated at the entrance of Bishop Kempe's chapel, attended by his dog—but he missed his daughter when he awoke this morning, and is in great distress about her."

"Strange!" exclaimed Etherege. "I begin to think the place is enchanted."

"It would seem so, indeed," replied Rochester.

While they were thus conversing, Pillichody, who was leaning against a column, with his eye fixed upon the door leading to Saint Faith's, observed it open, and the apprentice issue from it accompanied by two masked females. All three attempted to dart across the transept, and gain the northern entrance. But they were intercepted. Mr. Bloundel caught hold of Leonard's arm, while Rochester seized her whom he judged by her garb to be Amabel, and Parravicin, recognizing, as he thought, Nizza Macascree by her dress, detained her.

"What is the meaning of all this, Leonard?" demanded the grocer, angrily.

"You shall have an explanation instantly," replied the apprentice, "but think not of me—think only of your daughter."

"My father!—my father!"—cried the damsel, who had been detained by Parravicin, taking off her mask, and rushing towards the grocer.

"Who then have I got?" cried Rochester.

"The piper's daughter, I'll be sworn," said Etherege.

"You are right," replied Nizza, unmasking. "I changed dresses with Amabel, and hoped, by so doing, to accomplish her escape. But we have been baffled. However, as her father is here, it is of little consequence."

"Amabel," said the grocer, repulsing her, "before I receive you again, I must be assured that you have not been alone with the Earl of Rochester."

"She has not, sir," replied the apprentice. "Visit your displeasure on my head. I carried her off, and would have wedded her."

"What motive had you for this strange conduct?" asked Bloundel, incredulously.

Before Leonard could answer, Pillichody stepped forward. "Mr. Bloundel, you are deceived,—on the faith of a soldier, you are!" he cried.

"Peace, fool!" interposed Rochester. "I will not be outdone in generosity by an apprentice. Leonard Holt speaks the truth."

"If so," replied Bloundel, "he shall never enter my house again. Send for your indentures to-night," he continued, sharply, "but never venture to approach me more."

"Father, you are mistaken," cried Amabel. "Leonard Holt is not to blame. I alone have incurred your displeasure."

"You destroy yourself," whispered the apprentice. "I care not what happens to me, provided you escape the Earl."

"Come home, mistress," cried the grocer, dragging his daughter through the crowd which had gathered round them.

"Here is a pretty conclusion to the adventure!" exclaimed Parravicin; "but where is the apprentice—and where is the pretty Nizza Macascree? Fore heaven!" he added, as he looked round for them in vain. "I should not wonder if they have not eloped together."

"Nor I," replied Rochester. "I admire the youth's spirit, and trust he may be more fortunate with his second mistress than with his first."

"It shall be my business to prevent that," rejoined Parravicin. "Help me to search for her."

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE AMULET.

As the grocer disappeared with his daughter, Nizza Macascree, who had anxiously watched the apprentice, observed him turn deathly pale, and stagger, and instantly springing to his side, she supported him to a neighbouring column, against which he leaned till he had in some degree recovered from the shock. He then accompanied her to Bishop Kempe's beautiful chapel in the northern aisle, where she expected to find her father. But it was empty.

"He will be back again presently," said Nizza. "He is no doubt making the rounds of the cathedral. Bell will take care of him. Sit down on that bench, while I procure you some refreshment. You appear much in need of it."

And without waiting for a reply, she ran off, and presently afterwards returned with a small loaf of bread and a bottle of beer.

"I cannot eat," said Leonard, faintly. But seeing that his kind provider looked greatly disappointed, he swallowed a few mouthfulls, and raised the bottle to his lips. As he did so, a sudden feeling of sickness seized him, and he set it down untasted.

"What ails you?" asked Nizza, noticing his altered looks with uneasiness.

"I know not," he replied. "I have never felt so ill before."

"I thought you were suffering from agitation," she rejoined, as a fearful foreboding crossed her.

"I shall be speedily released from further trouble," replied the apprentice. "I am sure I am attacked by the plague."

"Oh! say not so!" she rejoined. "You may be mistaken."

But though she tried to persuade herself she spoke the truth, her heart would not be deceived.

"I scarcely desire to live," replied the apprentice, in a melancholy tone; "for life has lost all charms for me. But do not remain here, or you may catch the distemper."

"I will never leave you," she hastily rejoined; "that is," she added, checking herself,— "till I have placed you in charge of some one who will watch over you."

"No one will watch over me," returned Leonard. "My master has dismissed me from his service, and I have no other friend left. If you will tell one of the vergers what is the matter with me, he will summon the Examiner of Health, who will bring a litter to convey me to the pest-house."

"If you go thither, your fate is sealed," replied Nizza.

"I have said I do not desire to live," returned the apprentice.

"If you indulge in these gloomy thoughts, you are certain to bring about a fatal result," said Nizza. "Would I knew how to aid you! But I still hope you are deceived as to the nature of your attack."

"I cannot be deceived," replied Leonard, whose countenance proclaimed the anguish he endured. "Doctor Hodges, I think, is interested about me," he continued, describing the physician's residence,—“if you will inform him of my seizure, he may, perhaps, come to me.”

“I will fly to him instantly,” replied Nizza. And she was about to rush out of the chapel, when she was stopped by Parravicin and his companions.

“Let me pass,” she said, trying to force her way through them.

“Not so fast, fair Nizza,” rejoined Parravicin, forcing her back. “I must have a few words with you. Have I overrated her charms?” he added, to Rochester. “Is she not surpassingly beautiful?”

“In good sooth, she is,” replied the Earl, gazing at her with admiration.

“By the nut-brown skin of Cleopatra!” cried Piilichody, “she beats Mrs. Disbrowe, Sir Paul.”

“I have never seen any one so lovely,” said the Knight, attempting to press her hand to his lips.

“Release me, sir,” cried Nizza, struggling to free herself.

“Not till I have told you how much I love you,” returned the Knight, ardently.

“Love me!” she echoed, scornfully.

“Yes, love you,” reiterated Parravicin. “It would be strange if I, who profess myself so great an admirer of beauty, did otherwise. I am passionately enamoured of you. If you will accompany me, fair Nizza, you shall change your humble garb for the richest attire that gold can purchase,—shall dwell in a magnificent mansion, and have troops of servants at your command. In short, my whole fortune, together with myself, shall be placed at your disposal.”

“Do not listen to him, Nizza,” cried Leonard Holt, in a faint voice.

“Be assured I will not,” she answered. “Your insulting proposal only heightens the disgust I at first conceived for you,” she added, to the Knight. “I reject it with scorn, and command you to let me pass.”

“Nay, if you put on these airs, sweetheart,” replied Parravicin, insolently, “I must alter my tone likewise. I am not accustomed to play the humble suitor to persons of your condition.”

“Perhaps not,” replied Nizza; “but neither am I accustomed to this unwarrantable usage. Let me go. My errand is one of life and death. Do not hinder me, or you will have a heavy crime on your soul—heavier, it may be, than any that now loads it.”

“Where are you going?” said Parravicin, struck by her earnest manner.

“To fetch assistance,” she replied, “for one suddenly assailed by the pestilence.”

“Ah!” exclaimed the Knight, trembling, and relinquishing his grasp. “My path is ever crossed by that hideous spectre. Is it your father who is thus attacked?”

“No,” she replied, pointing to Leonard, “it is that youth.”

“The apprentice!” exclaimed Rochester. “I am sorry for him. Let us be gone,” he added to his companions. “It may be dangerous to remain here longer.”

With this, they all departed, except Parravicin.

“Come with us, Nizza,” said the latter. “We will send assistance to the sufferer.”

“I have already told you my determination,” she rejoined. “I will not stir a footstep with you. And if you have any compassion in your nature, you will not detain me longer.”

“I will not leave you here to certain destruction,” said the Knight. “You shall come with me whether you will or not.”

And as he spoke, he advanced towards her, while she retreated towards Leonard, who, rising with difficulty, placed himself between her and her persecutor.

“If you advance another footstep,” cried the apprentice, “I will fling myself upon you, and the contact may be fatal.”

Parravicin gazed furiously at him, and half unsheathed his sword. But the next moment he returned it to the scabbard, and exclaiming, “Another time! another time!” darted after his companions.

He was scarcely gone, when Leonard reeled against the wall, and, before Nizza could catch him, fell in a state of insensibility on the floor.

After vainly attempting to raise him, Nizza flew for assistance, and had just passed through the door of the chapel, when she met Judith Malmayns and Chowles. She instantly stopped them, and acquainting them with his condition, implored them to take charge of him while she went in search of Doctor Hodges.

“Before you go,” said Judith, “let me make sure that he is attacked by the plague. It may be some other disorder.”

“I hope so, indeed,” said Nizza, pausing; “but I fear the contrary.”

So saying, she returned with them to the chapel. Raising the apprentice with the greatest ease, Judith tore open his doublet.

“Your suspicion is correct,” she said. “Here is the fatal sign upon his breast.”

“I will fetch Doctor Hodges instantly,” cried Nizza.

“Do so,” replied Judith. “We will convey him to the vaults in Saint Faith’s, where poor Mr. Quatremain has just been taken. He will be better there than in the pest-house.”

“Anything is better than that,” said Nizza, shuddering.

As soon as she was gone, Chowles took off his long black cloak, and, throwing it over the apprentice, laid him at full length upon the bench, and, assisted by Judith, carried him towards the choir. As they proceeded, Chowles called out, "Make way for one sick of the plague!" and the crowd instantly divided, and gave them free passage. In this way they descended to Saint Faith's, and, shaping their course to the vault, deposited their burden on the very bed lately occupied by the unfortunate sexton.

"He has come here to die," said Judith to her companion. "His attack is but a slight one, and he might, with care, recover. But I can bargain with the Earl of Rochester for his removal."

"Take heed how you make such a proposal to his lordship," returned Chowles. "From what I have seen of him, he is likely to revolt at it."

"Every man is glad to get rid of a rival," rejoined Judith.

"Granted," replied Chowles; "but no man will pay for the riddance when the plague will accomplish it for him for nothing."

"With due attention, I would answer for that youth's recovery," said Judith. "It is not an incurable case, like Mr. Quatremain's. And so Doctor Hodges, when he comes, will pronounce it."

Shortly after this, Nizza Macascree appeared, with a countenance fraught with anxiety, and informed them that Doctor Hodges was from home, and would not probably return till late at night.

"That's unfortunate," said Judith. "Luckily, however, there are other doctors in London, and some who understand the treatment of the plague far better than he does. Sibbald, the apothecary of Clerkenwell, for instance."

"Do you think he would attend him?" asked Nizza, eagerly.

"To be sure he would," replied Mrs. Malmayns, "if he were paid for it. But you seem greatly interested about this youth. I have been young, and know what effect good looks and a manly deportment have upon our sex. He has won your heart. Ha! ha! You need not seek to disguise it. Your blushes answer for you."

"A truce to this," cried Nizza, whose cheeks glowed with shame and anger.

"You can answer a plain question, I suppose," returned Judith. "Is his life dear to you?"

"Dearer than my own," replied Nizza.

"I thought so," returned Judith. "What will you give me to save him?"

"I have nothing," rejoined Nizza, with a perplexed look—"nothing but thanks to give you."

"Think again," said Judith. "Girls like you, if they have no money, have generally some trinket, some valuable, in their possession."

"That is not my case," said Nizza, bursting into tears. "I never received a present in my life, and never desired one till now."

"But your father must have some money?" said Judith, inquisitively.

"I know not," replied Nizza, "but I will ask him.

He has never refused me anything yet, and will not now. What sum will content you?"

"Bring all you can," returned Judith, "and I will do my best."

"But you must cure him," said Nizza. "Nay, he must be well enough to quit this place before I pay you."

"I am content," returned Judith. "Now seek your father, girl, and return in two hours, and you shall find him going on as well as your heart could desire."

Nizza then departed, while Judith, with the assistance of Chowles, covered Leonard with blankets, and proceeded to light a fire. Long before this, the sick youth was restored to animation. But he was quite light-headed, and unconscious of his situation, and rambled about Amabel and her father. After administering such remedies as she thought fit, and as were at hand, Judith sat down with the coffin-maker beside a small table, and entered into conversation with him.

"Well," said Chowles, in an indifferent tone, as he poured out a glass of wine, "is it to be kill or cure?"

"I have not decided," replied Judith, pledging him.

"I still do not see what gain there would be in shortening his career," said Chowles.

"If there would be no gain, there would be gratification," replied Judith. "He has offended me."

"If that is the case, I have nothing further to say," returned Chowles. "But you promised the piper's daughter to save him."

"We shall see what she offers," rejoined Judith; "all will depend upon that."

"It is extraordinary," observed Chowles, after a pause, "that while all around us are sick or dying of the pestilence, we should escape."

"We are not afraid of it," replied Judith. "Besides, we are part of the plague ourselves. But I have been attacked, and am, therefore, safe."

"True," replied Chowles; "I had forgotten that. Well, if I fall ill, you shan't nurse me."

"You won't be able to help yourself then," returned Judith.

"Eh!" exclaimed Chowles, shifting uneasily on his seat.

"Don't be afraid," said Judith, laughing at his alarm. "I'll take every care of you. We are necessary to each other."

"So we are," replied Chowles; "and though false to all the rest of the world, we must be true to ourselves."

"We must," said Judith. "Let us reap as rich a harvest as we can, and when the scourge is over, we can enjoy ourselves upon the spoils."

"Exactly so," replied Chowles. "My business is daily, hourly, on the increase. My men are incessantly employed, and my only fear is, that we shall soon be obliged to bury the dead without coffins."

"Not unlikely," replied Mrs. Malmayns. "But there are plenty of ways of making money at a season like this. If one fails, we must resort to another. I shall make all I can, and in the shortest way."

"Right!" cried Chowles, with an atrocious laugh—"right! Ha! ha!"

"I have found out a means of propagating the distemper," pursued Judith—"of inoculating the sound with the plague-venom. I have tried the experiment on Mr. Quatremain and that youth, and you see how well it has answered."

"I do," replied Chowles. "But why destroy Mr. Quatremain?"

"Because I want to get hold of the treasure which he discovered by the help of the Mosaical rods in Saint Faith's, and which is now in his possession," replied Judith.

"I understand," nodded Chowles.

While they were thus conversing, Nizza Macascree again returned, and informed them, in tones of the deepest anguish, that she could not find her father,—“He has left the cathedral,” she said, “and will not probably return till nightfall.”

"I am sorry for it on your account," observed Judith, coldly.

"Why, you will not have the cruelty to neglect the poor young man till then—you will take proper precautions?" exclaimed Nizza.

"I will save him if I am paid," said Judith; "if not, he must take his chance."

"Heaven soften your heart!" exclaimed Nizza.

"Why should I exert myself for one about whose recovery I am indifferent?" said Judith.

"Why?" exclaimed Nizza—"but it is in vain to argue with you. I must appeal to your avarice since you are deaf to humanity. I have just bethought me that I have an old gold coin, which was given me years ago by my father. He told me it had been my mother's, and charged me not to part with it; and I never should have done so, except in an emergency like the present."

As she spoke, she drew from her bosom a broad gold piece. A hole was bored through it, and it was suspended from her neck by a narrow riband.

"Let me look at it," said Judith, taking the coin. "Who gave you this?" she asked, in an altered tone.

"My father," replied Nizza. "I have just told you so. It was my mother's."

"Impossible!" exclaimed Judith.

"Have you ever seen it before?" inquired Nizza, astonished at the change in the nurse's manner.

"I have," replied Judith, "and in very different hands."

"You surprise me!" cried Nizza, "and I must beseech you to explain yourself."

"Not now—not now," cried Judith, hastily returning the coin. "And this is to be mine in case I cure the youth?"

"I have said so," replied Nizza.

"Then make yourself easy," rejoined Judith. "He shall be well again in less than two days."

With this, she set a pan on the fire, and began to prepare a poultice, the materials for which she took from a small oaken chest in one corner of the vault. Nizza looked on anxiously, and while they were thus employed, a knock was heard at the door, and Chowles opening it, found the piper and one of the vergers.

"Ah! is it you, father?" cried Nizza, rushing to him.

"I am glad I have found you," returned the piper, "for I began to fear some misfortune must have befallen you. Missing you in the morning, I traversed the cathedral in search of you with Bell, well knowing if you were in the crowd she would speedily discover you."

His daughter then hastily recounted what had happened. When the piper heard that she had promised the piece of gold to the plague-nurse, he was very angry.

"You must never part with it," he said—"never. It is an amulet, and if you lose it, or give it away, your luck will go with it."

"Indeed!" exclaimed Nizza. "Judith Malmayns says she has seen it before."

"No such thing," cried the piper, hastily. "She knows nothing about it. But come with me. You must not stay here longer."

"But father—dear father! I want some money to pay the nurse for attending this poor young man," cried Nizza.

"I have none," replied the piper, "and if I had, I should not throw it away in so silly a manner."

"He will perish," replied Nizza, "if you do not help him."

"I shall be sorry for it," said the piper, "but it cannot be helped. Come along. I shall begin to think you are in love with the youth?"

"Then you will think the truth," observed Judith, roughly.

The piper uttered an angry exclamation, and, taking his daughter's hand, dragged her out of the vault.

"You will not get your fee," laughed Chowles.

"So it appears," replied Judith, taking the pan from the fire. "There is no use wasting a poultice upon him."

Shortly after this, the door of the vault again opened, and Parravicin looked in. He held a handkerchief, sprinkled with vinegar, to his mouth, and had evidently, from the manner in which he spoke, some antidote against the plague in his mouth.

"Nizza Macascree has been here—has she not?" he asked.

"She has just left with her father," replied Judith.

Parravicin beckoned her to follow him, and led the way to the north aisle of Saint Faith's.

"Is your charge likely to recover?" he asked.

"Humph!" exclaimed Judith; "that depends upon circumstances. Nizza Macascree offered me a large reward to cure him."

"Is he any connection of hers?" asked the Knight, sharply.

"None whatever," returned Judith, with a significant smile,—“but he may possibly be so.”

The Knight started, and could scarcely conceal his vexation.

"I thought as much," he muttered.

"He never shall recover," said Judith, halting, and speaking in a low tone,—“if you make it worth my while.”

"You read my wishes," replied the Knight, in a sombre tone. "Take this purse, and free me from him."

"He will never more cross your path," replied Judith.

"Enough!" exclaimed the Knight. "What has passed between us must be secret."

"As secret as the grave which shall soon close over the victim," she rejoined.

Parravicin shuddered, and hurried away, while Judith returned at a slow pace, and chinking the purse as she went, to the vault.

She had scarcely passed through the door, when Nizza Macascree appeared from behind one of the massive pillars, and staggered after her. "This dreadful crime must be prevented," she cried,—“but how? If I run to give the alarm, it may be executed, and no one will believe me. I will try to prevent it myself.”

Crossing the charnel, she was about to enter the vault, when Chowles stepped forth. Shrinking backwards, she allowed him to pass, and then trying the door, found it unfastened.

CHAPTER XIX.

HOW LEONARD HOLT WAS CURED OF THE PLAGUE.

NIZZA MACASCREE found Judith leaning over the couch of the sufferer, and examining the plague-spot on his breast. The nurse was so engrossed by her task that she did not hear the door open, and it was not until the piper's daughter was close beside her that she was aware of her approach. Hastily drawing the blankets over the apprentice, she then turned and regarded the intruder with a half-fearful, half-menacing look.

"What brings you here again?" she inquired, sharply.

"Ask your own heart, and it will tell you," rejoined Nizza, boldly. "I am come to preserve the life of this poor youth."

"If you think you can nurse him better than I can, you are welcome to take my place," returned Judith, affecting not to understand her. "I have plenty of other business to attend to, and should be glad to be released from the trouble."

"Can she have already effected her fell design?" thought Nizza, gazing at the apprentice, whose perturbed features showed that slumber brought him no rest from suffering. "No—no—she has not had time. I accept your offer," she added, aloud. "I will nurse him."

"You know not what you undertake, nor what risk you run," remonstrated Judith.

"I will run any risk to save him," rejoined Nizza.

"But what will your father say to this arrangement?" pursued Judith.

"When he knows my motive he will not blame me," answered Nizza. "Here I take my place," she continued, seating herself, "and will not quit it till he is out of danger."

"Then you will never quit it," rejoined the nurse, gloomily.

"Perhaps not," said Nizza, "but my resolution is taken."

"Your love for this youth borders upon insanity," cried Judith, unable to restrain her anger. "You shall not destroy yourself thus."

"Neither shall you destroy him," retorted Nizza. "It is to prevent the commission of the crime you meditate,—and for which you have been paid,—that I am determined to remain with him."

As she spoke, a singular and frightful change took place in the nurse's appearance. A slight expression of alarm was at first visible, but it was instantly succeeded by a look so savage and vindictive, that Nizza almost began to repent having trusted herself with so unscrupulous a person. But summoning up all her resolution, she returned Judith's glance with one as stern and steady, if not so malignant, as her own. A deep silence prevailed for a few minutes, during which each fancied she could read the other's thoughts. In Nizza's opinion, the nurse was revolving some desperate expedient to free herself from her perilous position, and she kept on her guard, lest an attack should be made upon her life. And some such design did, in reality, cross Judith, but abandoning it as soon as formed, she resolved to have recourse to more secret, but not less certain measures.

"Well," she said, breaking silence; "since you are determined to have your own way, and to catch the plague, and most likely perish from it, I shall no longer try to prevent you. Do as you please, and see what will come of it."

And she made as if she would depart, but finding Nizza did not attempt to stop her, she halted.

"I cannot leave you thus," she continued. "If you will remain, take this ointment," producing a small jar, "and rub the plague-spot with it. It is a sovereign remedy, and will certainly effect a cure."

"I will not touch it," returned Nizza.

"His death then be upon your head," rejoined Judith. And quitting the vault, she closed the door after her.

Greatly relieved by her departure, Nizza began to consider what she should do, and whether it would be possible to remove the apprentice to some safer place. While occupied with these reflections, the object of her solicitude heaved a deep sigh, and opening his eyes, fixed them upon her. It was evident, however, that he did not know her, but as far as could be gathered from his ravings, mistook her for Amabel. By degrees, however, he grew calmer, and the throbbing anguish of the tumour in some measure subsiding, his faculties became clearer.

"Where am I?" he exclaimed, pressing his hand forcibly to his brow, "and what is the matter with me?"

"You are in a vault near Saint Faith's," replied Nizza, "and—I will not deceive you—the disorder you are labouring under is the plague."

"The plague!" echoed Leonard, with a look of horror. "Ah! now I recollect. I was attacked immediately after Amabel's departure with her father. Heaven be praised! she is safe. That is my sole comfort amid all this distress. Could my master behold me now, he would pity me, and so perhaps would his daughter."

"Heed her not," said Nizza, in a slightly reproachful tone, "she does not deserve consideration. To return to yourself. You are not safe here. Judith Malnayns, the occupier of this vault, has been hired to take away your life."

"By the Earl of Rochester?" asked Leonard.

"No, by one far more deeply dyed in profligacy and crime—Sir Paul Parravicin," replied Nizza.

"I know him not," said Leonard. "What offence have I given him that he should seek my life?"

"He has conceived a passion for me," rejoined Nizza, after some hesitation, "and fancies you are an obstacle to his success. But let us drop the subject. Are you able to move hence?"

"I hope so," replied Leonard, raising himself on his arm.

"Wrap a blanket round you, then, and follow me," said Nizza, taking up the lamp, and hastening to the door. "Ah!" she exclaimed, with a cry of anguish—"it is locked."

"This building is destined to be my prison, and that treacherous woman my gaoler," groaned Leonard, sinking backwards.

"Do not despair," cried Nizza. "I will accomplish your deliverance."

"No, no—try to effect your own escape, and leave me to my fate," replied Leonard. "It will only increase my wretchedness to think you are a sharer in my danger."

"Our fortunes are linked together," she returned. "If I can escape, you can."

With this, she tried, by knocking against the door, and by loud and repeated outcries, to give the alarm. But no answer was returned, and she soon became convinced that Judith had locked the door of the charnel, which, it will be remembered, lay between the vault and the body of St. Faith's, so that no sound could reach the outer structure. Disturbed by what had just occurred, Leonard underwent another and severer access of his disorder, and his senses again wandered. Exerting all her powers to tranquillize him, Nizza succeeded so well that at last he sunk into a slumber.

Though regarding his situation as hopeless, she determined to neglect no precautions, and, taking the lamp, searched the vault, and soon found the pan containing the half-made poultice. The fire still smouldered on the hearth, and replenishing it from a scanty supply of fuel in one corner, she heated the poultice and applied it to the tumour. Satisfied with what she had done, and fondly hoping it might produce a beneficial effect, she continued her search. But though she discovered several phials, each bearing the name of some remedy for the pestilence, her distrust of Judith would not allow her to use any of them. Resuming her seat by the couch of the sufferer, and worn out with fatigue and anxiety, she presently dropped asleep. She was awakened after awhile by a slight noise near her, and, raising her head, beheld Judith bending over the apprentice with a pot of ointment in her hand, which she was about to apply to the part affected. The poultice had already been removed. Uttering a loud cry, Nizza started to her feet, and snatching the ointment from the nurse threw it away. As soon as the latter recovered from her surprise, she seized her assailant, and forced her into the seat she had just quitted.

"Stir not till I give you permission," she cried, fiercely. "I wish to save this young man, if you will let me."

"You intend to murder him," replied Nizza. "But while I live you shall never accomplish your atrocious purpose. Help! help!" And she uttered a prolonged and piercing scream.

"Peace! or I will strangle you," cried Judith, compressing Nizza's slender throat with a powerful gripe.

And she would, in all probability, have executed her terrible threat, if a secret door in the wall had not suddenly opened, and admitted Solomon Eagle. A torch supplied the place of his brazier, and as he reared it aloft, and threw its ruddy light upon the group, he looked like some power of darkness summoned by a potent evocation. On seeing him, Judith relinquished her grasp, and gazed at him with a mixture of defiance and apprehension; while Nizza, half dead with terror, instantly rushed towards him, and throwing herself at his feet, besought him to save her.

"No harm shall befall you," replied Solomon Eagle, extending his arms over her. "Tell me what has happened?"

Nizza hastily explained the motive of Judith's attempt upon her life. The plague-nurse endeavoured to defend herself, and, in her turn, charged her accuser with a like attempt. But Solomon Eagle interrupted her.

"Be silent, false woman," he cried; "and think not to delude me with these idle fabrications. I am well assured of the truth of your atrocious attempt. I fully believe that you would have taken the life of this poor youth; and, did not I regard you as one of the necessary agents of Heaven's vengeance, I would instantly deliver you to justice. But the measure of your iniquities is not yet filled up. Your former crimes are not unknown to me. Neither is the last dark deed, which you imagined was concealed from every human eye, hidden from me."

"I know not what you mean," returned Judith, trembling, in spite of herself.

"I will tell you, then," rejoined Solomon Eagle, catching her hand, and dragging her into the farthest corner of the vault. "Give ear to me," he continued, in a low voice, "and doubt, if you can, that I have witnessed what I shall relate. I saw you enter a small chamber behind the vestry, in which Thomas Quatremain, who once filled the place of minor canon in this cathedral, was laid. No one was there beside yourself and the dying man. Your first business was to search his vestments, and take away his keys."

"Ha!" exclaimed Judith, starting.

"While securing them," pursued Solomon Eagle, "the owner wakened, and uttered a low, but angry remonstrance. Better he had been silent. Dipping a napkin in an ewer of water that stood beside him, you laid the wet cloth upon his face, and did not remove it till life was extinct. All this I saw."

"But you will not reveal it?" said Judith, tremblingly.

"I will not," replied Solomon Eagle; "for the reason I have just stated,—namely, that I look upon you as a scourge appointed by heaven."

"And so I am," rejoined Judith, with impious exultation. "My mission is to destroy and pillage, and I will fulfil it."

"Take heed you do not exceed it," replied Solomon Eagle, sternly. "Lift a finger against either of these young persons, and I will reveal all. Yes," he continued, menacingly, "I will disclose such dreadful things against you, that you will assuredly be adjudged to a gibbet higher than the highest tower of this proud fane."

"I defy you, wretch!" retorted Judith. "You can prove nothing against me."

"Defy me?—ha!" cried Solomon Eagle, with a terrible laugh. "First," he added, dashing her backwards against the wall, "first, to prove my power. Next," he continued, drawing from her girdle a small bunch of keys, "to show that I speak the truth. These were taken from the vest of the murdered man. No one, as yet, but ourselves knows that he is dead."

"And who shall say which of the two is the murderer?" cried Judith. "Villain! I charge you with the deed."

"You are, indeed, well fitted for your task," returned Solomon Eagle, gazing at her with astonishment, "for sometimes Heaven, for its own wise purpose, will allow the children of hell to execute its vengeance upon earth. But think not you will always escape. No, you may pursue your evil course for awhile—you and your companion in crime—but a day of retribution will arrive for both—a day when ye shall be devoured, living, by flames of fire—when all your sins shall arise before your eyes, and ye shall have no time for repentance—and when ye shall pass from one fierce fire to another yet fiercer, and wholly unquenchable!"

As he concluded, he again dashed her with such violence against the wall, that she fell senseless upon the ground.

"And now," he said, turning to Nizza Macascree, who looked on in alarm and surprise, "what can I do for you?"

"Bear this youth to a place of safety," was her answer.

Solomon Eagle answered by lifting up the pallet upon which Leonard Holt was laid, with as much ease as if it had been an infant's cradle, and calling on Nizza to bring the torch with her, passed with his burthen through the secret door. Directing her to close it after them, he took his way along a narrow stone passage, until he came to a crack in the wall commanding a small chamber, and desired her to look through it. She obeyed, and beheld, stretched upon a couch, the corpse of a man.

"It is Mr. Quatremain, the minor canon," she said, retiring.

"It is," returned Solomon Eagle, "and it will be supposed that he died of the plague. But his end was accelerated by Judith Malmayns."

Without allowing her time for reply, he pursued his course, traversing another long narrow passage.

"Where are we?" asked Nizza, as they arrived at the foot of a spiral stone staircase.

"Beneath the central tower of the cathedral," replied Solomon Eagle. "I will take you to a cell known only to myself, where this youth will be in perfect safety."

Ascending the staircase they passed through an arched door, and entered the great northern ambulatory. Nizza gazed down for a moment into the nave, but all was buried in darkness, and no sound reached her to give her an idea that any one was below. Proceeding along the ambulatory towards the west, Solomon Eagle arrived at a small recess in the wall, opposite one of the broad-arched openings looking into the nave, and entering it, he pressed against a spring at the further extremity, and a stone door flying open, discovered a secret cell, on the floor of which his brazier was burning. Depositing his burthen on the floor, he said to Nizza, "He is now safe. Go in search of proper assistance, and I will watch by him till you return."

Nizza did not require a second exhortation, but quitting the cell and noticing its situation, swiftly descended the stone staircase, and hurrying along the northern aisle, proceeded to a small chamber beneath the tower, at its further extremity, where she knew one of the vergers lodged. Speedily arousing him, she told him her errand, and implored him to remain on the watch, till she returned with Doctor Hodges. The verger promised compliance, and opening a wicket in the great doorway, allowed her to go forth. A few seconds brought her to the Doctor's dwelling, and though it was an hour after midnight, her summons was promptly answered by the old porter, who conveyed her message to his master. Doctor Hodges had just retired to rest, but, on learning in whose behalf his services were required, he sprang out of bed, and hastily slipped on his clothes.

"I would not for half I am worth, that that poor youth should perish," he cried. "I take a great interest in him—a very great interest. He must not be neglected. How comes he to be at Saint Paul's, I wonder? But I can obtain information on that point as I go there. No time must be lost."

Ruminating thus, he swallowed a glass of sack, a flask of which always stood by his bedside, and providing himself with a case of instruments, and such medicines as he thought he might require, he went down stairs to Nizza. On the way to the cathedral, she acquainted him with what had befallen Leonard during the last four-and-twenty hours, and the only point she thought it needful to keep back, was Judith's attempt on his life. This she intended to reveal at a more fitting opportunity. The Doctor expressed the utmost anxiety and regret at what he termed the over-severe and harsh conduct of Mr. Bloundel—but promised to set all to rights again without loss of time.

"The only difficulty I foresee," he observed, "is that the poor youth is attacked by the pestilence; and though I may succeed, with Heaven's assistance in curing him, his master will probably shut up his house before I can accomplish my object, in which case all chance of a union with Amabel will be at an end."

"So much the better," rejoined Nizza, sharply. "She does not deserve him."

"There I agree with you," returned Hodges. "But do you know any one who does?" he added, with a slight but significant smile.

No answer was returned, and as they had just reached the portico of the cathedral, they entered the sacred structure in silence.

As they ascended the winding stairs, loud outcries, resounding along the ambulatory, and echoed by the vaulted roof of the nave, convinced them that the sufferer was again in a state of frenzy, produced by fever and the anguish of his sore; and on reaching the cell, they found him struggling violently with Solomon Eagle, who held him down by main force.

"He is in a fearfully-excited state, truly," observed Hodges, as he drew near, "and must not be left for a moment, or he will do himself a mischief. I must give him a draught to allay the fever, and compose his nerves—for in this state I dare not have recourse to the lancet."

So saying, he dressed the tumour, and pouring the contents of a large phial which he had brought with him into a cup, held it to the burning lips of the apprentice, who eagerly quaffed it. It was soon apparent that the dose produced a salutary effect, and a second was administered. Still, the sufferer, though calmer, continued to ramble as before,—complained that his veins were filled with molten lead,—begged them to plunge him in a stream, so that he might cool his unquenchable heat and thirst,—and appeared to be in great agony.

Doctor Hodges watched by him till day-break, at which time he sank into a slumber and Solomon Eagle, who had never till then relinquished his hold of him, now ventured to leave him. The Doctor was then about to depart, but at the urgent solicitation of Nizza, who had stationed herself at the door of the cell, he agreed to remain a little longer.

Two hours after this, the doors of the cathedral were opened, and a large crowd soon assembled within the nave, as on the preceding day. The tumult of voices rose to the ambulatory and awakened the sleeper. Before he could be prevented, he started from his bed, and dashing aside the feeble opposition offered by Nizza and the Doctor, ran along the ambulatory, uttering a loud and fearful cry. Finding the door of the winding staircase open, he darted through it, and in a few seconds re-appeared in the aisle. Hearing the cries, several persons rushed to meet him, but on beholding his haggard looks and strange appearance,—he was merely wrapped in a blanket,—they instantly understood what was the matter with him, and recoiled.

Meantime, Doctor Hodges, who had run to one of the arched openings looking upon the nave, called out to them to secure the fugitive. But all fled at his approach, and when he reached the door of the southern transept, the verger, instead of attempting to stop him, retreated with a cry of alarm. As he passed through the outlet, one man, bolder than the rest, caught hold of him and endeavoured to detain him. But leaving the blanket in his hands, and without other covering than his shirt, the apprentice dashed across the churchyard,—next skaped his course down Saint Bennett's Hill,—then crossed Thames-street,—and, finally, speeding along another narrow thoroughfare, reached Paul's Wharf.

Gazing for a moment at the current sweeping past him,—it was high tide,—he plunged head foremost into it from the high embankment, and on rising to the surface, being a strong and expert swimmer, struck out for the opposite shore. Those who beheld him were struck with amazement, but such was the alarm occasioned by his appearance that none ventured to interfere with him. He had not crossed more than a fourth part of the stream, when Doctor Hodges arrived at the wharf, but neither promises of reward nor threats could induce any of the watermen to follow him. The humane physician would have sprung into a boat, but feeling he should be wholly unable to manage it, he most reluctantly abandoned his purpose.

Scarcely doubting what the result of this rash attempt would be, and yet unable to tear himself away, he lingered on the wharf till Leonard reached the opposite bank, where an attempt was made by a party of persons to seize him. But, instead of quietly surrendering himself, the apprentice instantly leapt into the river again, and began to swim back towards the point whence he started. Amazed at what he saw, the Doctor ordered his servant, who by this time had joined the group, to bring a blanket, and, descending to the edge of the river, awaited the swimmer's arrival. In less than ten minutes he gained the shore, and clambering on the bank, fell from exhaustion.†

"This is a violent effort of nature, which has accomplished more than science or skill could do," said Hodges, as he examined the body, and saw that the pestilential tumour had entirely disappeared; "he is completely cured of the plague."

And throwing the blanket over him, he ordered him to be conveyed to his own house.

CHAPTER XX.

THE PEST-HOUSE.

NOT a word passed between the grocer and his daughter, as he took her home from Saint Paul's. Amabel, in fact, was so overpowered by conflicting emotions that she could not speak; while her father, who could not help reproaching himself for the harshness he had displayed towards Leonard Holt, felt no disposition to break silence. They found Mrs. Bloundel at the shop door, drowned in tears, and almost in a state of distraction. On seeing them, she rushed towards her daughter, and straining her to her bosom, gave free vent to the impulses of her affection. Allowing the first transports of joy to subside, Mr. Bloundel begged her to retire to her own room with Amabel, and not to leave it till they had both regained their composure.

His request complied with, the grocer then retraced his steps to the cathedral, with the intention of seeking an explanation from Leonard, and, if he saw occasion to do so, of revoking his severe mandate. But long before he reached the southern transept, the apprentice had disappeared, nor could he learn what had become of him. While anxiously pursuing his search amid the crowd, and addressing inquiries to all whom he thought likely to afford him information, he perceived a man pushing his way towards him. As this person drew near, he recognised Pillichody, and would have got out of his way had it been possible.

"You are looking for your apprentice, I understand, Mr. Bloundel," said the bully, taking off his hat—"if you desire it, I will lead you to him."

Unwilling as he was to be obliged to one whom he knew to be leagued with the Earl of Rochester, the grocer's anxiety overcame his scruples, and signifying his acquiescence, Pillichody motioned him to follow him. Shouldering his way through the crowd, the bully did not stop till they reached the northern aisle, where they were comparatively alone.

"Your apprentice is a fortunate spark, Mr. Blounddel," he said. "No sooner does he lose one mistress than he finds another. Your daughter is already forgotten, and he is at this moment enjoying a tender tête à tête in Bishop Kempe's chapel with Nizza Macascree, the blind piper's daughter."

"It is false, sir," replied the grocer, incredulously.

"Unbelieving dog!" cried Pillichody, in a furious tone, and clapping his hand upon his sword, "it is fortunate for you that the disparity of our stations prevents me from compelling you to yield me satisfaction for the insult you have offered me. But I caution you to keep better guard upon your tongue for the future, especially when addressing one who has earned his laurels under King Charles the Martyr."

"I have no especial reverence for the monarch you served under," replied Bloundel. "But he would have blushed to own such a follower."

"You may thank my generosity that I do not crop your ears, base roundhead," rejoined Pillichody. "But I will convince you that I speak the truth, and if you have any shame in your composition, it will infallibly be called forth."

So saying, he proceeded to Bishop Kempe's chapel, the door of which was slightly ajar, and desired the grocer to look through the chink. This occurred at the precise time that the apprentice was seized with sudden faintness, and was leaning for support upon Nizza Macascree's shoulder.

"You see how lovingly they are seated together," observed Pillichody, with a smile of triumph. "Bowers of Paphos! I would I were as near the rich widow of Watling-street. Will you speak with him?"

"No," replied Bloundel, turning away, "I have done with him for ever. I have been greatly deceived."

"True," chuckled Pillichody, as soon as the grocer was out of hearing; "but not by your apprentice. I will go and inform Parravicin and Rochester that I have discovered the girl. The Knight must mind what he is about, or Leonard Holt will prove too much for him. Either I am greatly out, or he is already master of Nizza's heart."

To return to Amabel. As soon as she was alone with her mother, she threw herself on her knees before her, and imploring her forgiveness, hastily related all that had occurred.

"But for Leonard Holt," she said, "I should have been duped into a false marriage with the Earl, and my peace of mind would have been for ever destroyed. As it is, I shall never be happy till he is restored to my father's favour. I will brave every thing rather than he shall suffer for my fault."

"I lament that your father should be deceived," said Mrs. Bloundel, "and I lament still more that Leonard Holt should be so unjustly treated. Nevertheless, we must act with the utmost caution. I know my husband too well to doubt for a moment that he will hesitate to fulfil his threat. And now, my dear child," she continued, "do not the repeated instances you have experienced of this wicked nobleman's perfidy, and of Leonard's devotion—do they not, I say, open your eyes to the truth, and show you which of the two really loves you, and merits your regard?"

"I will hide nothing from you, mother," replied Amabel. "In spite of his perfidy,—in spite of my conviction of his unworthiness, I still love the Earl of Rochester,—nor can I compel myself to feel any regard, stronger than that of friendship, for Leonard Holt."

"You distress me sadly, child," cried Mrs. Bloundel. "What will become of you! I wish my husband would shut up his house. That might put an end to the difficulty. I am not half so much afraid of the plague as I am of the Earl of Rochester. But compose yourself as your father desired, that when he sends for us we may be ready to meet him with cheerfulness."

Mr. Bloundel, however, did not send for them. He remained in the shop all day, except at meal times, when he said little, and appeared labouring under a great weight of anxiety. When Amabel took leave of him for the night, he dismissed her with coldness; and though he bestowed his blessing upon her, the look that accompanied it was not such as it used to be.

On the following day, things continued in the same state. The grocer was cold and inscrutable, and his wife, fearing he was meditating some severe course towards Amabel, and aware of his inflexible nature, if a resolution was once formed, shook off her habitual awe, and thus addressed him:—

"I fear you have not forgiven our daughter. Be not too hasty in your judgment. However culpable she may appear, she has been as much deceived as yourself."

"It may be so," replied Bloundel. "Still, she has acted with such indiscretion that I can never have confidence in her again, and without confidence, affection is as naught. Can I say to him who may seek to espouse her, and whom I may approve as a husband,—'Take her! she has never deceived me, and will never deceive you?' No. She has deceived me, and may, therefore, deceive others. I do not know the precise truth of the story of her abduction (if such it was) by Leonard Holt, neither do I desire to know it, because it might entail upon me the necessity of acting with greater severity than I desire towards her; but I know enough to satisfy me she has been excessively imprudent, and has placed herself voluntarily in situations of the utmost jeopardy."

"Not voluntarily," returned Mrs. Bloundel. "She has been lured into difficulties by others."

"No more!" interrupted the grocer, sternly. "If you wish to serve her, keep guard upon your tongue."

"I have done," replied Mrs. Bloundel. "But you must forgive my saying that I think you have acted unjustly towards Leonard Holt."

"Not if he spoke the truth," rejoined the grocer;

"and if he did not, he must take the consequences. But be this as it may, I should have forgiven him—should have taken him back to my house again—if I had not accidentally discovered that he had transferred his affections to another."

"Impossible!" exclaimed his wife. "If ever man loved woman truly and devotedly, Leonard Holt loves our daughter. This I unhesitatingly affirm. Trust me, you are deceived."

"I cannot have been so in this instance," replied the grocer. "But he is evidently ashamed of himself, or he would, ere this, have communicated with me."

"He may be afraid to do so," rejoined Mrs. Bloundel. "You must make some allowance for him. He is a kind-hearted young man, and I love him next to my own children. In spite of all that has passed, I still hope to have him for a son-in-law."

"Much must be explained before that can occur," returned the grocer. "If Leonard Holt is what you represent him, and what I would wish to think him, Amabel will never make him happy."

"If she can conquer her present misplaced attachment, she will do so," replied Mrs. Bloundel. "But when do you mean to shut up your house?" she added, anxious to turn the conversation.

"To-morrow," replied the grocer.

"Whether Leonard returns or not?" asked Mrs. Bloundel.

"I will wait for no one," returned her husband. "I have now completed my arrangements."

Seeing from his manner that he was not to be dissuaded, Mrs. Bloundel then retired, and hastened to her daughter, to acquaint her with the result of the interview.

In the afternoon of the same day, the grocer, who began to feel extremely uneasy about Leonard, again repaired to Saint Paul's, to see whether he could obtain any tidings of him, and learnt, to his great dismay, from one of the vergers, that a young man, answering to the apprentice's description, had been attacked by the pestilence, and having been taken to the vaults of Saint Faith's, had made his escape from his attendants, and, it was supposed, had perished. Alarmed by this intelligence, he descended to the subterranean church, where he met Judith Malmayns and Chowles, who confirmed the verger's statement.

"The poor young man, I am informed," said Chowles, "threw himself into the Thames, and was picked up by a boat, and afterwards conveyed, in a dying state, to the pest-house in Finsbury-fields, where you will probably find him, if he is still alive."

Mr. Bloundel heard no more. Quitting the cathedral, he hastened to Finsbury-fields, and sought out the building to which he had been directed. It was a solitary farm-house, of considerable size, surrounded by an extensive garden, and had only been recently converted, to its present melancholy use. Near it was a barn also fitted up with beds for the sick. On approaching the pest-house, Mr. Bloundel was greatly struck with the contrast presented by its exterior to the misery reigning within. Its situation was charming. In the midst, as has just been stated, of a large and, until lately, well-cultivated garden, and seen under the influence of a bright and genial May day, the whole place looked like the picture of healthfulness and comfort. But a closer view speedily dissipated the illusion, and showed that it was the abode of disease and death. Horrid sounds saluted the ears, and ghastly figures met the eyes, and the fragrance of the flowers was overpowered by the tainted and noxious atmosphere issuing from the open doors and windows. The grocer had scarcely entered the gate, when he was arrested by an appalling shriek, followed by a succession of cries so horrifying that he felt half disposed to fly. But mustering up his resolution, and breathing at a phial of vinegar, he advanced towards the principal door, which stood wide open, and called to one of the assistants. The man, however, was too busy to attend to him, and while waiting his leisure, he saw no fewer than three corpses carried out to an outbuilding in the yard, where they were left till they could be taken away at night for interment.

Sickened by the sight, and blaming himself for venturing near this contagious spot, Mr. Bloundel was about to depart, when a young surgeon stepped forth to him, and in reply to his inquiries after Leonard Holt, said—"Twelve persons were brought here last night, and five this morning, but I do not remember any of their names. You can go through the rooms, and search for the apprentice, if you think proper."

Mr. Bloundel hesitated, but his humanity overcame his apprehension, and murmuring a prayer that he might be preserved from infection, he followed his conductor into the house. Prepared as he was for a dreadful spectacle, the reality far exceeded his anticipations. Along both sides of a large room, occupying nearly the whole of the ground-floor, were rows of pallets, on which were laid the sick, many of whom had to be tied down to their couches. Almost all seemed in a hopeless state, and the cadaverous hue of their countenances proclaimed that death was not far off. Though the doors and windows were open, and the room was filled with the fumes and exhalations arising from pans of coal, and plates of hot iron on which drugs were burning, nothing could remove the putrid and pestilential smell that pervaded the chamber. The steaming vapour settled on the panes of the windows, and on the walls, and fell to the ground in heavy drops. Marching quickly past each bed the grocer noted the features of its unfortunate occupant, but though there were many young men, Leonard was not among the number. His conductor then led him to an upper room, where he found other surgeons dressing the sores of their patients, most of whom uttered loud shrieks while under their hands. Here an incident occurred which deeply affected the grocer. A poor young woman, who had been brought there with her child on the previous evening, had just expired and the infant, unable to obtain its customary nourishment, uttered the most piteous cries. It was instantly removed by a nurse and proper food given it, but Mr. Bloundel was informed that the plague-tokens had already appeared, and that it would not probably live over the night. "I have no doubt," said the young chirurgeon, "it will be buried with its mother." And so it happened.

The grocer turned away to hide his emotion, and endeavoured through his blinded gaze to discover Leonard, but, as will be anticipated, without success. Stunned by the cries and groans that pierced his ears, and almost stifled by the pestilential effluvia, he rushed out of the house, and gladly accepted a glass of sack offered him by his conductor, which remove the dreadful feeling of nausea that affected him.

"I now remember that the two last persons brought here were taken to the barn," observed the chirurgeon. "I will go with you thither, if you think proper."

The grocer assented, and the chirurgeon crossed the yard, and opened the door of the barn, on the floor of which upwards of twenty beds were laid. Passing between them, Mr. Bloundel narrowly scrutinized every countenance, but, to his great relief, recognised none of them. One couch alone remained to be examined. The poor sufferer within it had drawn the coverings over his face, and when they were removed he was found quite dead! He was a young man, and the agony he had endured in the last struggle was shown by his collapsed frame and distorted features. It was not, however, Leonard, and, so far satisfied, though greatly shocked, Mr. Bloundel hurried out.

"Thank Heaven! he is not here!" he exclaimed, to his conductor.

"You have not seen the dead bodies in the out-house," returned the other. "It is possible he may be among them."

"I trust not," rejoined the grocer, shuddering. "But as I have gone thus far, I will not leave my errand unaccomplished. I will thank you to let me look at them."

The chirurgeon then led the way to a spacious out-building, once used for cattle, in the midst of which stood a large frame supporting six bodies, covered only with a sheet. Mr. Bloundel could not overcome his repugnance to enter this shed; but the chirurgeon, who appeared habituated to such scenes, and to regard them lightly, threw off the sheet, and raised the corpses, one by one, that he might the better view them. One peculiarity the grocer noticed; namely, that the limbs of these unfortunate victims of the pestilence did not stiffen, as would have been the case if they had died of any other disorder, while the blotches that appeared on the livid flesh made them objects almost too horrible to look upon. In many cases, the features were frightfully distorted, the hands clenched, and the toes bent towards the soles of the feet. Everything denoted the dreadful pangs that must have attended dissolution.

Greatly relieved to find that the whole of this ghastly group were strangers to him, Mr. Bloundel thanked the chirurgeon, and departed. Convinced that he had been deceived by the coffin-maker, he now began to hope that the whole of the story was false, but he determined not to rest till he had thoroughly investigated the matter. Before doing so, however, he thought it advisable to return home, and accordingly he shaped his course towards Cripplegate, and passing through the postern, stopped at an apothecary's shop, and got his apparel fumigated, and sprinkled with spirits of hartshorn and sulphur.

On reaching Wood-street, he noticed, with some uneasiness, that a number of persons were gathered together before his dwelling. His fears were speedily relieved by finding that the assemblage was collected by a preacher, who was pronouncing an exhortation to them in tones almost as loud and emphatic as those of Solomon Eagle. The appearance of this person was very remarkable, and attracted the attention of the grocer, who joined the crowd to listen to him. As far as could be judged, he was a middle-aged man, with black hair floating over his shoulders, earnest features, and a grey eye of extraordinary brightness. His figure was slight and erect, and his gestures as impassioned as his looks. He spoke with great rapidity, and his eloquence, combined with his fervent manner and expression, completely entranced his auditory. He was habited in a cassock and bands, and had taken off his cap, which was held by an attendant stationed near the stool on which he was mounted. The latter differed materially from his master. His closely-cropped hair, demure looks, sugar loaf hat, and suit of rusty sable, seemed to proclaim him a Puritan; but his twinkling eye,—for he had but one, and wore a black patch over the orifice,—his inflamed cheeks, and mulberry-nose contradicted the idea.

As soon as the preacher perceived Mr. Bloundel, he addressed his discourse to him; and alluding to his religious habits and general excellence of character, held him up as an example to the rest of his audience. The grocer would fain have retreated, but the preacher besought him to stay, and was proceeding in the same strain when a sudden interruption took place. A slight disturbance occurring amid the crowd, the attendant attempted to check it, and in doing so, received a sound buffet on the ears. In endeavouring to return the blow, he struck another party, who instantly retaliated, and a general fray commenced—some taking one side, some the other. In the midst of the confusion, three persons forced their way towards the preacher, knocked him from his stool, and assailing him with most opprobrious epithets, dealt him several seemingly-severe blows, and would have further maltreated him, if Mr. Bloundel had not interposed, and, pushing aside his assailants, led him into his dwelling, the door of which he closed. Shortly afterwards, the crowd dispersing the preacher's companion entered the shop in search of his master.

"I hope you have sustained no material injury during this tumult, reverend and dear sir?" he asked, with great apparent solicitude.

"I am not much hurt," replied the preacher; "but I received a blow on the head which has stunned me. The faintness will go off presently. You were the cause of this disturbance, Bambolio."

"I, Doctor Maplebury? replied Bambolio—"I endeavoured to stop it. But your reverence looks extremely ill. I am sure, sir," he added to Mr. Bloundel, "after the high character my master gave of you in his discourse, and which I am satisfied is deserved, you will extend your hospitality towards him."

"Readily," replied the grocer. "Here, Blaize, assist the reverend gentleman into the inner room, and bid your mistress come down stairs immediately."

Doctor Maplebury was then conveyed between the porter and Bambolio into the inner room, where he sank into a chair in a complete state of exhaustion. The next moment, Mrs. Bloundel made her appearance with Amabel. The latter no sooner beheld the preacher than she started and trembled so violently that she could scarcely support herself; but her mother, who only saw a fainting man, flew to his assistance, and called to Patience to bring restoratives. These being applied, Doctor Maplebury was soon able to rouse himself sufficiently to look round the room, and fix his eyes on Amabel.

"So our old friends are here again," said Patience, in a low tone, to Blaize, as they left the room together.

"Old friends!—What do you mean?" rejoined the porter.

"Why, the Earl of Rochester and Major Pillichody," replied Patience. "I knew them at once, and so did Mistress Amabel. But if I hadn't discovered them, the Major would soon have let me into the secret by the way in which he squeezed my hand."

"Indeed!" exclaimed Blaize, angrily. "I'll go and acquaint my master with the trick directly."

"Do so," replied Patience, "and the house will be shut up to-morrow. Our only chance of avoiding that calamity is in the Earl."

CHAPTER XXI.

HOW THE GROCER SHUT UP HIS HOUSE.

PLACED in a warm bed, and carefully tended by the humane physician, Leonard Holt slept tranquilly for some hours, and when he awoke, though so weak as scarcely to be able to lift an arm, he was free from all ailment. Feeling ravenously hungry, he made known his wants, and provisions being set before him, he was allowed to eat and drink in moderation. Greatly revived by the meal, he arose and attired himself in habiliments provided for him by the Doctor, who finding him fully equal to conversation, questioned him as to all that had occurred prior to his seizure.

"You have acted nobly," said Hodges, at the close of his recital, "and if Amabel had a spark of generosity in her composition, she would worthily requite you. But I do not expect it. How different is her conduct from that of the piper's pretty daughter. The latter really loves you, and I would advise you, as a friend, to turn your thoughts to her. She will make you happy; whereas the indulgence of your present hopeless passion—for hopeless it is—can only lead to wretchedness."

"Would I could follow your advice!" replied Leonard, "but alas! it is wholly impossible. Amabel does not love the Earl of Rochester more blindly, more constantly, than I love her, and I could as soon change my nature as transfer my affections to another."

"I am truly sorry for it," rejoined Hodges, in a tone of deep sympathy. "And you still desire to return to your master?"

"Unquestionably," replied Leonard. "If I am banished the house, I shall wander round it night and day like a ghost."

"I will accompany you there this evening," said Hodges, "and trust I shall be able to arrange matters without compromising Amabel. I wish I could forward your suit more efficiently. But I see no chance of it, and to deal plainly with you, I do not think a marriage with her would be for your happiness. The brilliant qualities of your noble rival at present so dazzle her eyes, that your own solid worth is completely overlooked. It will be well if her father can preserve her from ruin."

"The Earl shall die by my hand rather than succeed in his infamous purpose," cried Leonard, fiercely.

"No more of this!" exclaimed Hodges. "If you would have me take an interest in you, never let me hear you give utterance to such a sentiment again. Amabel has another guardian, more powerful even than her father,—the plague. Ere long, the Earl, who has a sufficient value for his own safety, will quit the capital."

"I hope the pestilence will either drive him hence, or number him among its victims," returned Leonard, in a sombre tone.

At this juncture, the old porter entered the room, and informed Doctor Hodges that the piper's daughter was below, and had called to inquire after his patient.

"Show her up stairs," replied Hodges.

A few moments afterwards, Nizza was ushered into the room, and on beholding the improved appearance of Leonard, could not repress an exclamation of delight, while a deep blush suffused her cheeks.

"You are surprised to find him so much recovered," observed Hodges, with a smile. "Nay, you may approach him with safety. There is no fear of contagion now."

"Having satisfied myself on that point, I will take my leave," rejoined Nizza, in some confusion.

"Not till you have allowed me to return my thanks, I trust," said Leonard, advancing towards her, and taking her hand. "I owe my life to you."

"Then pay the debt by devoting it to her," said Hodges. "But you must excuse me for a short time. I have business to attend to, but will be back again directly."

Left alone together, the young couple were so much embarrassed that for some moments neither could utter a word. At length, Nizza, who had suffered her hand to remain in that of Leonard, gently withdrew it.

"Circumstances have given me a claim to your confidence," she faltered, "and you will not misconstrue my motive, when I ask whether you still retain the same affection as formerly for Amabel?"

"Unfortunately for myself I do," replied Leonard.

"And unfortunately for me as well," sighed Nizza.

"Doctor Hodges says he can restore you to your master's favour. You will therefore return home, and we shall meet no more."

"In these precarious times, those who part, even for a brief space, can feel no certainty of meeting again," said Leonard. "But I hope we shall be more fortunate."

"You mistake me," replied Nizza. "Henceforth I shall sedulously avoid you. Till I saw you I was happy, and indifferent to all else—my affections being centered in my father and my dog. Now, I am restless and miserable. My former pursuits are abandoned, and I think only of you. Despise me if you will after this frank avowal; but believe that I would not have made it, if I had not resolved that this should be our last meeting."

"Despise you!" echoed Leonard. "Oh, no! I shall ever feel the greatest gratitude to you. But, perhaps, it is better we should meet no more."

"And yet you throw yourself in the way of Amabel," cried Nizza. "You have not resolution to fly from a danger which you counsel me to shun."

"It is too true," replied Leonard. "But my chief motive for returning is to protect her from the Earl."

"That excuse will not avail with me," returned Nizza, bitterly. "You cannot live away from her. But I have said enough—more than enough," she added, correcting herself. "I must now bid you farewell for ever. May you be happy—and may Amabel love you, as I love you!"

As she said this, she would have rushed out of the room, if she had not been stopped by Doctor Hodges.

"Whither so fast?" he cried, detaining her.

"Oh! let me go—let me go, I implore of you?" she cried, bursting into an agony of tears.

"Not till you have composed yourself," rejoined the Doctor. "What is the matter? But I need not ask. I wonder Leonard can be insensible to charms like yours, coupled with such devotion. Everything seems to be at cross purposes, and it requires some one more skilled in affairs of the heart than an old bachelor, like myself, to set them right. Sit down. I have a few questions of importance to ask you before you depart."

And partly by entreaty, partly by compulsion, he induced her to take a chair, and as soon as she was sufficiently composed to answer him, questioned her as to what she knew relative to Judith Malmayns and Chowles.

"Mr. Quatremain, the minor canon, has died of the plague in one of the vaults of Saint Faith's," he observed, "and I more than suspect, from the appearance of the body, has not met with fair play."

"Your suspicion is well-founded, sir," replied Nizza. "Solomon Eagle told me that the unfortunate man's end was hastened by the plague-nurse. Nor is this her sole crime. She was hired to make away with Leonard Holt in the same manner, and would have accomplished her purpose but for my intervention."

"Neither she nor her partner in crime, the coffin-maker, shall escape justice this time," replied Hodges. "I will instantly cause her to be arrested, and I trust she will expiate her offences at Tyburn. But, to change the subject. I am sincerely interested about you, Nizza, and wish I could make Leonard as sensible of your merits as I am myself. I still hope that a change may take place in his feelings."

"My heart tells me the contrary," replied Nizza. "There is no hope for either of us. Farewell, Leonard!" And she rushed out of the room.

"I am greatly concerned for the girl," observed Hodges, heaving a sigh, "and grieve that nothing can be done for her. She deserves a better fate than appears to await her."

"She does indeed," said Leonard. "But I could not encourage hopes that can never be realized."

"Certainly not," replied Hodges, "and I only lament that you should be compelled to act thus. I must now leave you for a short time. I have several places to visit, and, besides, I must lodge information against Judith Malmayns. In the evening, I will go with you to Wood-street, and make no doubt I shall be able to reconcile you to your master."

With this, he quitted the apprentice, and after making his rounds, went before a magistrate and detailed all that had come to his knowledge respecting the criminal practices of Judith Malmayns and Chowles. In the course of the day, the accused parties were arrested, and, after a long examination, conveyed to Newgate. Solomon Eagle could not be found, neither could Sir Paul Parravicin. It appeared that Mr. Quatremain's residence had been entered by thieves on that very morning, and the box of treasure discovered in Saint Faith's, abstracted. But though the strongest suspicion of the robbery attached to Chowles and Judith, the fact could not be brought home to them.

We shall now proceed to Wood-street, and ascertain what took place there. Refreshments were placed before the supposed Doctor Maplebury by the grocer, while his attendant was sent to the kitchen, and directions given to Blaize to take every care of him. Old Josyna was occupied about her own concerns, and Pillichody, perceiving from the porter's manner that his disguise was detected, laid aside concealment altogether, and endeavoured to win the other over to the Earl's interests.

"If this marriage takes place," he said, "I am authorised by my noble friend to state that he will appoint you his steward, with a large salary, and that will be a very different situation from the miserable one you hold at present. A nobleman's steward! Think of that. You will have a retinue of domestics under your control, and will live quite as well as his lordship."

"You are not deceiving me?" inquired Blaize, astounded at the offer.

"On my honour! no," replied Pillichody. "Assist us in this scheme, and I pledge myself to the fulfilment of my promise."

"I have some scruples," hesitated Blaize.

"Scruples! pshaw!" cried Pillichody. "You can have no hesitation in benefitting yourself. If you remain here, the house will be shut up, and you will be kept a close prisoner for months in the very heart of an infected city, and I dare say will be buried in yonder cellar; whereas, if you go with the Earl of Rochester, you will dwell in a magnificent country mansion—a palace, I ought to call it—enjoy every luxury, and remain there till the plague is over."

"That last reason decides me," replied Blaize. "But I suppose his lordship will provide himself with a medicine chest."

"He has already got one as large as this table," said Pillichody, "and you shall have the key of it."

"Enough!" exclaimed Blaize. "I am yours. Only point out to me how I can further your designs."

"I will not fail to do so," replied Pillichody.

"Pray, what am I to be?" asked Patience, who had listened to the foregoing conversation with a secret smile at Blaize's credulity.

"You, sweetheart!" exclaimed Pillichody,—"I will take care of you. You shall be my housekeeper."

"Hold!" cried Blaize. "I cannot permit that. Patience and I are engaged."

"Since you are promoted to such an important situation, you can make a better match," observed Patience. "I release you from the engagement."

"I don't choose to be released," returned Blaize, "I will marry you on the same day that the Earl weds Amabel."

"That will be to-night, or to-morrow at the latest," said Pillichody. "Consent, sweetheart," he added in a whisper to Patience. "If we can once get you and your pretty mistress out of the house, we will leave this simpleton in the lurch."

"No, I will never consent to any such thing," returned Patience, in the same tone.

"What's that you are saying?" inquired Blaize, suspiciously.

"Major Pillichody says he will marry me, if you won't," returned Patience.

"I have just told you I will," rejoined Blaize. "But he must not continue his attentions when you are my wife. I feel I shall be very jealous."

"I am glad to hear it," returned Patience, bursting into a loud laugh, "for that proves you love me."

"Well," observed Pillichody, "I won't interfere with a friend; and, as there is no knowing what may occur, it will be well to prepare accordingly."

So saying, he fell to work upon the provisions loading the board, and ate and drank as if determined to lay in a stock for the next day or two.

Meantime, the Earl made rapid progress in the good opinion of both Mr. Blounnel and his wife. Adapting his discourse precisely to their views, and exerting his unequalled conversational powers to the utmost, he so charmed them both that they thought they could listen to him for ever. While thus engaged, he contrived ever and anon to steal a glance at Amabel, and on these occasions, his eyes were quite as eloquent and intelligible as his tongue.

Among other topics interesting to the grocer, the persecution to which his daughter had been recently subjected was brought forward. Mr. Blounnel could not reprobate the Earl's conduct more strongly than his guest did; and he assailed himself with such virulence that, in spite of her uneasiness, Amabel could not repress a smile. The grocer then adverted to Leonard Holt, and expressed his intention of making further inquiries after him in the course of the evening,—a resolution highly applauded by his hearer, who affected to exculpate the apprentice.

In short, he so accommodated himself to the grocer's opinions, and so completely won his regard, that the latter offered him an asylum in his house during the continuance of the pestilence. This was eagerly accepted, and the Earl, hazarding a look at Amabel at the moment, perceived that she changed colour and became greatly agitated. Mrs. Bloundel also noticed her confusion, but attributing it to anything but the right cause, begged her, in a low tone, to control herself.

At length, the opportunity for which Rochester had been sighing, occurred. Mr. Bloundel called his wife out of the room for a moment, and as their eldest son Stephen was in the shop, and the two other children upstairs, Amabel was left alone with her lover. The door was no sooner closed than he sprang towards her and threw himself at her feet.

"Amabel," he said, "shall I avail myself of your father's offer? Shall I remain here with you—the happiest of prisoners? Or, will you once more accompany me? This time, our marriage shall not be interrupted."

"Perhaps not, my lord," she replied, gravely; "but it will be a mock ceremonial like the last. Do not attempt to deceive me. I am fully aware of your intentions, and after the awful fate of the wretched instrument of your purposed criminality, you will not readily get another person to tempt in like manner the vengeance of heaven. I have had a severe struggle with myself. But at length, I have triumphed over my irresolution. I will not disguise from you that I love you still, and must ever, I fear, continue to love you. But I will not be yours on the terms you propose. Neither will I leave this house with you, nor suffer you to remain in it, in any other than your proper character. On my father's return, I will disclose all to him. If your designs are honourable, I am sure he will no longer oppose my union with you. If not, we part for ever."

"Be prudent, sweet girl, I entreat of you," cried the Earl, imploringly. "Your indiscretion will ruin all. There are a thousand reasons why your father should not be consulted on the matter."

"There are none that weigh with me," she interrupted, decidedly. "I have been bewildered,—beside myself,—but, thank Heaven, I have recovered before it is too late."

"You are beside yourself at this moment," rejoined Rochester, unable to control his anger and mortification, "and will bitterly repent your folly. Neither your own supplications nor my rank will have any weight with your father, prejudiced as he is against me. Will not my plighted word content you?"

"No, my lord, you have broken it already," returned Amabel. "My father shall know the truth."

A dark shade passed over Rochester's countenance, and a singular and most forbidding expression, which Amabel had once before noticed, took possession of its beautiful lineaments. His love for her seemed changed to hate, and she tremblingly averted her gaze. At this juncture, the door opened, and the grocer and his wife entered the room. The former started on seeing Amabel and the supposed preacher in such close proximity, and a painful suspicion of the truth crossed his mind. He was not, however, kept long in suspense. Throwing off his wig, and letting his own fair ringlets fall over his shoulders, the Earl tore open his cassock, and disclosed his ordinary rich attire. At the same time, his face underwent an equally striking change,—each feature resuming its original expression; and the grocer, though he witnessed the whole transformation, could scarcely believe that the same individual he had recently beheld stood before him.

"You now know who I am, Mr. Bloundel, and can guess what brought me hither," said Rochester, with a haughty salutation.

"I can, my lord," replied the grocer; "and I give you full credit for your daring and ingenuity. After the manner in which I have been imposed upon myself, I can make allowance for others." He then turned to Amabel, and said in a stern tone, "You are no longer my daughter."

"Father," she cried, rushing towards him and falling at his feet, "do not cast me off for ever. I am not now to blame. It is owing to my determination to disclose all to you that the Earl has thus revealed himself. I might have deceived you further—might have flown with him."

"Forgive her! oh forgive her!" cried Mrs. Bloundel—"or, if any ill happens to her, you will be responsible for it."

"Is this the truth, my lord?" asked the grocer.

Rochester bowed stiffly in acquiescence.

"Then you are again my child," said Bloundel, raising her and pressing her to his bosom. "What are your intentions towards her?" he continued, addressing the Earl.

"They may be readily surmised," replied Rochester, with a scornful laugh.

"Will you wed her, if I agree to the union?" asked Bloundel, trembling with concentrated rage.

Amabel looked at her lover as if her life hung on his answer.

Rochester affected not to hear the question, but as it was repeated still more peremptorily, he replied carelessly—"I will consider of it."

"Deceived! deceived!" cried Amabel, falling on her mother's neck, and bursting into tears.

"This outrage shall not pass unpunished," cried Bloundel. And before the Earl could draw his sword or offer any resistance, he threw himself upon him, and hurling him to the ground, set his foot upon his bosom.

"Do not kill him," shrieked Amabel, terrified by the expression of her father's countenance.

"What are you about to do?" gasped Rochester, struggling ineffectually to get free.

"Bid Stephen come hither," cried the grocer, sternly, "and let him bring a cord with him."

"You are not going to hang the Earl?" rejoined Mrs. Bloundel.

"Do as I bid you," rejoined her husband, "and lose no time."

As she was about to leave the room, the door was opened, and Doctor Hodges entered, followed by Leonard and Stephen.

"Mercy on us! what's the matter?" cried the former, in astonishment.

"You are just arrived in time to prevent mischief," replied Mrs. Bloundel. "Pray, interfere between them. My husband will attend to you."

"Arise, my lord," said Mr. Bloundel, removing his foot from the prostrate nobleman—"you are sufficiently punished by being found in this disgraceful condition. Remember that your life has been at my disposal."

Thus liberated, Rochester sprang to his feet, and regarding the group with a menacing and disdainful look, walked up to Amabel, and saying to her, "You shall yet be mine," strode out of the room. He then marched along the passage, and called to Pillichody who instantly answered the summons. Accompanied by Hodges, the grocer followed them to the shop, where the bully not departing so quickly as he desired, and refusing to be more expeditious, he kicked him into the street. This done, and the door fastened, he tarried only till he had received a full explanation of all that had occurred from the friendly physician, and then returning to the inner room, warmly greeted Leonard, and congratulated him on his extraordinary recovery from the plague.

Happiness was thus once more restored to every member of the grocer's family, except Amabel, who still continued downcast and dejected, and entreated permission to retire to her own room. A cheerful evening was then passed by the others, and the Doctor did not offer to take his departure till the clock struck eleven.

"It is the last night I shall spend here for some months," he said—"perhaps the last I may ever spend here, and I have stayed longer than I intended. But I did not like to abridge my enjoyment." Shaking hands cordially with the whole party, he observed, in an under tone, as he took leave of Leonard, "Do not forget Nizza Macasree."

On the following day, the grocer nailed up the shutters, and locked and barred the doors of his house.

BOOK THE THIRD.

CHAPTER XXII.

THE IMPRISONED FAMILY.

THE first few days of their confinement were passed by the grocer's family in a very uncomfortable manner. No one, except Mr. Bloundel, appeared reconciled to the plan, and even he found it more difficult of accomplishment than he had anticipated. The darkness of the rooms, and the want of ventilation caused by the closed windows and barred doors, gave the house the air of a prison, and occasioned a sense of oppression almost intolerable. Blaize declared "it was worse than being in Newgate, and that he must take an additional rufus a day, to set right his digestion;" while Patience affirmed "that it was like being buried alive, and that she could not stand it." Mr. Bloundel paid no attention to their complaints, but addressed himself seriously to the remedy. Insisting upon the utmost attention being paid to cleanliness, he had an abundant supply of water drawn, with which the floors of every room and passage were washed down daily. By such means the house was kept cool and wholesome; and its inmates becoming habituated to the gloom, in a great degree recovered their cheerfulness.

The daily routine of the establishment was as follows. The grocer rose at dawn and proceeded to call up the whole of his family. They then assembled in a large room on the second story, where he offered up thanks that they had been spared during the night, and prayed for their preservation during the day. He next assigned a task to each, and took care to see it afterwards duly fulfilled,—well knowing that constant employment was the best way to check repining and promote contentment. Heretofore, the servants had taken their meals in the kitchen. But now, they always sat down to table with him. "I will make no distinction at this season," he said; "all shall fare as I fare, and enjoy the same comforts as myself. And I trust that my dwelling may be as sure an ark of refuge amid this pestilential storm, as the patriarch's proved when Heaven's vengeance was called forth in the mighty flood."

Their devotions ended, the whole party adjourned to one of the lower rooms, where a plentiful breakfast was provided, of which they partook. The business of the day then began, and, as has just been observed, no one was suffered to remain idle. The younger children were allowed to play and exercise themselves as much as they chose in the garret, and Blaize and Patience were occasionally invited to join them. A certain portion of the evening was also devoted to harmless recreation and amusement. The result may be anticipated. No one suffered in health, while all improved in spirits. Prayers, as usual, concluded the day, and the family retired to rest at an early hour.

This system of things may appear monotonous, but it was precisely adapted to the exigencies of the case, and produced a most salutary effect. Regular duties and regular employments were imposed upon each, and their constant recurrence, so far from being irksome, soon became agreeable. After awhile, the whole family seemed to care little about the external world, but to live only for each other, and to think only of each other,—and to Leonard Holt, indeed, that house was all the world. Those walls contained everything dear to him, and he would have been content never to leave them if Amabel had been always there. He made no attempt to renew his suit,—seldom or ever exchanging a word with her, and might have been supposed to have become wholly indifferent to her. But it was not so. His heart was consumed by the same flame as before. No longer, however, a prey to jealousy,—no longer apprehensive of the Earl,—he felt so happy, in comparison with what he had been, that he almost prayed that the term of their imprisonment might be prolonged. Sometimes, the image of Nizza Macascree would intrude upon him, and he thought, with a feeling akin to remorse, of what she might suffer,—for he was too well acquainted with the pangs of unrequited love not to sympathise deeply with her.

As to Amabel, she addressed herself assiduously to the tasks enjoined by her father, and allowed her mind to dwell as little as possible on the past, but employed all her spare time in study and devotional exercises.

It will be remembered that the grocer had reserved a means of communication with the street, in the shape of a shutter, opening from a small overhanging room in the upper story. To this place he now frequently repaired, and though he did not as yet think it necessary to have recourse to all the precautionary measures he intended eventually to adopt,—such as flashing a pistol when he looked forth,—yet he never opened the shutter without holding a phial of vinegar, or a handkerchief wetted with the same liquid, to his face.

Before closing his house, he had hired a porter, who now occupied the hutch at his door, and held himself in readiness to execute any commission, or perform any service that might be required. Fresh vegetables, poultry, eggs, butter, and milk, were brought by a higgler from the country—for he wished to defer resorting to his own supplies as long as he could,—and raised by means of a basket or a can attached to the pulley. Butcher's meat was fetched him from Newgate-market by the porter. This man, whose name was Ralph Dallison, had been formerly in the employ of the grocer, who, knowing his character, could place entire reliance on him. Dallison reported the progress of the pestilence daily, and acquainted him with the increasing amount of the Bills of Mortality. Thirty houses, he said, were infected in Cheapside, and two in Woodstreet, one of which was but a short distance from the grocer's habitation. A watchman was stationed at the door and the red cross marked upon it, and on the following night the grocer heard the sound of the doleful bell announcing the approach of the pest-cart.

The weather still continued as serene and beautiful as ever, but no refreshing showers fell,—no soft and healthful breezes blew,—and it was now found to be true, what had been prognosticated,—namely, that with the heats of summer the plague would fearfully increase. The grocer was not incommoded in the same degree as his neighbours. By excluding the light, he excluded the heat, and the care which he took to have his house washed down kept it cool.

The middle of June had now arrived, and such dreadful accounts were daily brought him of the ravages committed by the pestilence, that he would no longer take in fresh provisions, but began to open his stores. Dallison told him that the alarm was worse than ever,—that vast numbers were endeavouring to leave the city, but no one could now do so without a certificate, which was never granted if the slightest suspicion attached to the party.

"If things go on in this way," said the porter, "London will soon be deserted. No business is conducted as it used to be, and everybody is viewed with distrust. The preachers have left their churches, and the Lord's day is no longer observed. Many medical men have departed, declaring their services are no longer of any avail. All public amusements are suspended, and the taverns are only open to the profane and dissolute, who deride God's judgments, and declare they have no fear. Robberies, murders, and other crimes, are greatly on the increase, and the most dreadful deeds are committed with impunity. You have done wisely, sir, in protecting yourself against them."

"I have reason to be thankful that I have done so," replied Mr. Bloundel, closing his shutter to meditate on what he had just heard.

And there was abundant food for reflection. Around him was a great and populous city, hemmed in, as by a fire, by an exterminating pestilence, that spared neither age, condition, nor sex. No man could tell what the end of all this would be—neither at what point the wrath of the offended Deity would stop,—nor whether He would relent, till He had utterly destroyed a people who so contemned His word. Scarcely hoping for leniency, and filled with a dreadful foreboding of what would ensue, the grocer addressed a long and fervent supplication to Heaven, imploring a mitigation of its wrath.

On joining his family, his grave manner and silence showed how powerfully he had been affected. No one questioned him as to what had occurred, but all understood he had received some distressing intelligence.

Amid his anxiety one circumstance gave the grocer unalloyed satisfaction. This was the change that had been wrought in Amabel's character. It has been stated that she had become extremely devout, and passed the whole of the time not appointed for other occupations, in the study of the Scriptures, or in prayer. She grew more sedate, and her conversation assumed a tone that gave her parents, and especially her father, inexpressible pleasure. Mrs. Bloundel would have been more delighted with the change, if it had seemed to forward her own favourite scheme of a union with Leonard—but as this was not the case, though she rejoiced in the improvement, she still was not entirely satisfied. She could not help noting also, that her daughter had become pale and thin, and though she uttered no complaint, Mrs. Bloundel began to fear that her health was declining. Leonard Holt looked on in wonder and admiration, and if possible his love increased, though his hopes diminished,—for though Amabel was kinder to him than before, her kindness seemed the result rather of a sense of duty than regard.

Upon one occasion they were left alone together, and instead of quitting the room as she had been accustomed, Amabel called to Leonard, who was about to depart, and requested him to stay. The apprentice instantly obeyed,—the colour forsook his cheeks,—and his heart beat violently.

"You desire to speak with me, Amabel," he said :—"have you relented?—Is there any hope for me?"

"Alas! no," she replied; "and it was on that very point I have now detained you. You will, I am sure, rejoice to learn that I have at length fully regained my peace of mind,—and have become sensible of the weakness of which I have been guilty,—of the folly, worse than folly, I have committed. My feelings are now under proper restraint, and, viewing myself with other eyes, I see how culpable I have been. Oh! Leonard, if you knew the effort it has been to conquer the fatal passion that consumed me,—if I were to tell you of the pangs it has cost me,—of the tears I have shed,—of the heart-quakes I have endured, you would pity me.”

“I do, indeed, pity you,” replied Leonard, “for my own sufferings have been little less severe. But I have not been as successful as you in subduing them.”

“Because you have not pursued the right means, Leonard,” she rejoined. “Fix your thoughts on high;—build your hopes of happiness on Heaven;—strengthen your faith;—and you will soon find the victory easy. A short time ago, I thought only of worldly pleasures, and was ensnared by vanity and admiration,—enchained to one whom I knew to be worthless, and who pursued me only to destroy me. Religion has preserved me from the snare, and religion will restore you to happiness. But you must devote yourself to Heaven, not lightly, but with your whole soul. You must forget me,—forget yourself,—forget all but the grand object. And this is a season of all others, when it is most needful to lead a life of piety and devotion,—to look upon yourself as dead to this world, and to be ever prepared for that to come. I shudder to think what might have been my portion hereafter, had I perished in my sin.”

“Yours is a happy frame of mind,” returned Leonard, “and I would that I had a chance of attaining the same tranquillity. But if you have conquered your love for the Earl—if your heart is disengaged, why deny me a hope?”

“My heart is not disengaged, Leonard,” she replied; “it is engrossed by Heaven. While the plague is raging around us thus,—while thousands are daily carried off by it,—and while every hour, every moment, may be our last, our thoughts ought always to be fixed above. Though I have ceased to love the Earl, I can never love another; and therefore it would be unjust to you, to whom I owe so much, to hold out hopes that never can be realized.”

“Alas! alas!” cried Leonard, unable to control his emotion.

“Compose yourself, dear Leonard,” she cried, greatly moved. “I would I could comply with your wishes. But alas! I cannot. I could only give you,” she added, in a tone so thrilling, that it froze the blood in his veins,—“a breaking, perhaps a broken heart!”

“Gracious heaven!” exclaimed Leonard, “is it come to this? How much that villain has to answer for!”

“Again I beg you to compose yourself,” she rejoined calmly,—“and I entreat you not to let what I have told you pass your lips. I would not alarm my father, or my dear and anxious mother, on any account—and there may be no reason for alarm. But should there be so, I am prepared to die. Promise me, therefore, you will be silent.”

Leonard gave the required pledge.

“I have unwittingly been the cause of much affliction to you,” pursued Amabel, “and would gladly see you happy, and there is one person, I think, who would make you so,—I mean Nizza Macascree. From what she said to me when we were together in the vaults of Saint Faith’s, I am sure she is sincerely attached to you. Could you not love her?”

“No,” replied Leonard. “There is no change in affection like mine.”

“Pursue, then, the course I have advised,” replied Amabel, “and you will find all your troubles vanish. Farewell! I depend upon your silence.”

So saying, she quitted the room, leaving Leonard in a state of indescribable anxiety.

Faithful, however, to his promise, he made no mention of his uneasiness to the grocer or his wife, but indulged his grief in secret. Ignorant of what was passing, Mr. Bloundel, who still was not without apprehension of some further attempt on the part of the Earl, sent his porter to make inquiries after him, and learnt that he was still at Whitehall, but that the court had fixed to remove to Hampton Court,—unless the plague abated, of which there was no probability,—at the end of June. The porter also informed him that the city was fast emptying itself,—that the Lord Mayor’s residence was literally besieged with applications for bills of health,—that officers were stationed at the gates,—and that beside these, barriers and turnpikes were erected, at which the certificates were examined,—and that such persons as contrived to get away without them were driven back by the inhabitants of the neighbouring villages, who refused to supply them with necessities, and as they could not return home, many had perished of want, or, perhaps, of the pestilence, in the open fields. Horses and coaches, he added, were not to be procured, except at exorbitant prices, and many thousands had departed on foot, locking up their houses, and leaving their effects behind them.

“In consequence of this,” continued the porter, “many houses have been broken open, and though the watch has been trebled, still they cannot be in all places at once; and strong as the force is, it is not adequate to the present emergency. Bands of armed robbers stalk the streets at night, taking vehicles with them, built to resemble pest-carts, and beating off the watch, they break open houses, and carry off what goods they please.”

This intelligence greatly alarmed the grocer, and he began to fear his plans might be defeated in an unexpected manner. He engaged Dallison to procure another trusty companion to take his place at night, and furnished him with money to purchase arms. He no longer slept as tranquilly as before, but frequently repaired to his post of observation to see that the watchman was at his post, and that all was secure.

For the last few days, he had remarked with some uneasiness that a youth frequently passed to and fro before the house, and gazed at its barred windows, and he at first imagined that he might be leagued with the nocturnal marauders, but a narrower survey of the stripling, whose appearance was eminently prepossessing, soon dispelled the idea. Still, as he seemed to haunt the spot, the grocer began to have a new apprehension, and to suspect he was an emissary of the Earl of Rochester. Talking to him, therefore, he inquired his business. The youth returned an evasive answer, and withdrew, but the next day he was there again. On this occasion Mr. Bloundel sent for Leonard Holt, and pointing out the suspected party to him, asked him if he had seen him before. The youth's back being towards them, the apprentice unhesitatingly answered in the negative,—but as he turned the next moment, and looked up, revealing features of feminine delicacy and beauty, set off by long flowing jet-black ringlets, Leonard started and coloured.

"I was mistaken," he said.—"I have seen him before."

"Is he one of the Earl of Rochester's pages?" asked Mr. Bloundel.

"No," replied Leonard, "and you need not give yourself any concern about him. I am sure he intends no harm."

Thus satisfied, the grocer thought no more about the matter. He then arranged with Leonard that he should visit the window at alternate hours with himself, and appointed the following night as that on which his duties should commence.

On the same night, however, an alarming incident occurred, which kept the grocer and his apprentice for several hours on the watch. The family had not retired to rest more than an hour, when the report of fire-arms was heard close to the street door, and Mr. Bloundel, hastily calling up Leonard, they repaired to the little room overlooking the street, and found that a desperate struggle was going on below. The moon being overclouded, and the lantern extinguished, it was too dark to distinguish the figures of the combatants, and in a few seconds all became silent, except the groans of a wounded man. Mr. Bloundel then called out to know what was the matter, and ascertained from the sufferer, who proved to be his own watchman, that the adjoining house, being infected, had been shut up by the authorities, and its owner, unable to bear the restraint, had burst open the door,—shot the man stationed at it,—and firing another pistol at the poor wretch who made the statement, and missing him, had subsequently assaulted him with his sword.

It was a great grief to Mr. Bloundel that he could not aid the unfortunate watchman, and he had almost determined to hazard a descent by the pulley, when a musical voice was heard below, and the grocer soon understood that the youth about whom his curiosity had been previously excited, was raising the sufferer, and endeavouring to staunch his wounds. Finding this impossible, however, at Mr. Bloundel's request he went in search of assistance, and presently afterwards returned with a posse of the watch, bearing halberds and lanterns, who carried off the wounded man, and afterwards started in pursuit of his assailant.

Mr. Bloundel then entered into conversation with the youth, who informed him that his name was Flitcroft,—that he was without a home, all his relations being dead of the plague,—and that he was desirous of serving as a watchman, in place of the poor wretch who had just been removed. Leonard would have remonstrated against this arrangement, but Mr. Bloundel was so much pleased with Flitcroft's conduct, that he would listen to no objection.

Accordingly, provisions were lowered down in the basket to him, and he stationed himself in the hutch. Nothing material occurred during the following day. The youth resigned his post to Dallison, but returned in the evening.

At midnight, Leonard took his turn to watch. It was a bright moonlight night, but though he occasionally looked out into the street, and perceived that Flitcroft was below, he gave no intimation of his presence. All at once, however, he was alarmed by a loud cry, and opening the shutter, perceived the youth struggling with two persons, one of whom he recognised as Sir Paul Parravicin and the other as Pillichody.

He shouted to them to release him, but they laughed at his vociferations, and in spite of his resistance dragged their captive away. Maddened at the sight, Leonard lowered the pulley as quickly as he could, with the intention of descending by the rope. At this moment, Flitcroft threw an agonized look behind him, and perceiving what had been done, broke suddenly from his captors, and before he could be prevented, sprang into the basket, and laid hold of the rope. Leonard, who had seen the movement, and divined its object, drew up the pulley with the quickness of thought, and so expeditiously was the whole accomplished, that ere the knight and his companion reached the spot, Flitcroft was above their heads, and the next moment was pulled through the window, and in safety by the side of Leonard.

CHAPTER XXIII.

HOW FIRES WERE LIGHTED IN THE STREETS.

FLITCROFT, or rather Nizza Macascree, for it is useless to affect further mystery, as soon as she could find utterance, murmured her thanks to the apprentice, who, though rejoiced at her deliverance, felt considerable misgiving as to what his master would say when he learnt what had occurred. Perceiving his uneasiness, and guessing the cause, Nizza hastened to relieve it.

"I reproach myself bitterly for placing you in this situation," she said; "but I could not help it, and will free you from my presence the moment I can do so with safety. When I bade you farewell, I meant it to be for ever, and persuaded myself I could adhere to my resolution. But I was deceived. A prey to constant anxiety, I could not accompany my poor father in his rounds, and if I went forth at all, my steps involuntarily led me to Wood-street. At last, I resolved to disguise myself, and borrowed this dress from a Jew clothesman who has a stall in the cathedral. Thus equipped, I wandered past the house, in the hope of obtaining a glimpse of you, and fortune has favoured me more than I expected, though it has led to this unhappy result. Heaven only knows what will become of me! Oh! that the pestilence would select me as one of its victims! But those who court it are ever shunned by it."

"I can neither advise you," replied Leonard, in a sombre tone, "nor help you. Ha!" he exclaimed, as a loud noise was heard below,—“your persecutors are trying to break into the house.”

Rushing to the window, and gazing downwards, he perceived Sir Paul Parravicin and Pillichody battering against the shop door, and endeavouring to burst it open. It was, however, so stoutly barricaded that it resisted all their efforts.

"What is to be done?" cried Leonard. "The noise will certainly alarm my master, and you will be discovered."

"Heed me not," rejoined Nizza, distractedly, "you shall not run any risk on my account. Let me down by the pulley—deliver me to them—anything rather than you should suffer by my indiscretion."

"No, no," replied Leonard; "Mr. Bloundel shall know all. His love for his own daughter will make him feel for you. But come what will, I will not abandon you."

As he spoke, a timid knock was heard at the door, and a voice without exclaimed, in accents of the utmost trepidation, "Are you there, Leonard? Robbers are breaking into the house,—we shall all be murdered."

"Come in, Blaize," rejoined Leonard, opening the door and admitting the porter—"you may be of great assistance to me."

"In what way?" demanded Blaize.—"Ah! who's this?" he added, perceiving Nizza. "How comes this page here?"

"Do not concern yourself about him, but attend to me," replied Leonard. "It is my determination to drive away those persons from the door. You must lower me down in the basket attached to the pulley."

"And will you dare to engage them?" asked Blaize, looking forth. "They are armed. As I live," he continued, peeping forth, "one is Major Pillichody, the rascal who dared to make love to Patience. I have half a mind to go down with you, and help to drive him off."

"You shall not encounter this danger for me," said Nizza, endeavouring to stay Leonard, who, having thrust a sword into his girdle, was preparing to pass through the window.

"Do not hinder me," replied the apprentice, breaking from her. "Take hold of the rope, Blaize, and mind you do not let it run down too quickly."

With this, he got into the basket, grasped the rope, and, as the porter carefully obeyed his instructions, he reached the ground in safety. On seeing him, Pillichody darted across the street, and flourishing his sword, and uttering tremendous imprecations, seemed inclined to beat a retreat. Not so Parravicin. Instantly assailing the apprentice, he slightly wounded him in the arm. Seeing how matters stood, and that victory was likely to declare itself for his patron, Pillichody returned, and attacking the apprentice, by their combined efforts he was speedily disarmed. Pillichody would have passed his sword through Leonard's body, but the Knight stayed his hand.

"The fool has placed himself in our power," he said, "and he shall pay for his temerity. Nevertheless, I will spare his life, provided he will assist us to get into the house, or will deliver up Nizza Macascree."

"I will do neither," replied Leonard, fiercely.

"Then die!" rejoined Parravicin.

And raising his sword, he was about to strike, when, at the moment, the basket was again quickly lowered to the ground. It bore Nizza Macascree, who, rushing between them, arrested the stroke.

"Oh! why have you done this?" cried Leonard, in a tone of reproach.

"I will tell you why," rejoined Parravicin, triumphantly; "because she saw you were unable to defend her, and like a true woman, surrendered herself to the victor. Take care of him, Pillichody, while I secure the girl. Stab him, if he attempts to stir."

And twining his arms round Nizza, notwithstanding her shrieks and resistance, he bore her away. Infuriated by the sight, Leonard Holt threw himself upon Pillichody, and a desperate struggle took place between them, which terminated this time successfully for the apprentice. Wrestling his long rapier from the bully, Leonard rushed after Parravicin, and reached the end of Wood-street just in time to see him spring into a coach, and drive off with his prize. Speeding after them along Blowbladder-street, and Middle-row, as Newgate-street was then termed, the apprentice shouted to the coachman to stop, but no attention being paid to his vociferations, and finding further pursuit unavailing, he came to a stop. He then slowly retraced his steps towards the grocer's residence, and on arriving there, found the basket drawn up. Almost afraid to call out, he at length mustered courage enough to give the signal, and was answered by Mr. Bloundel, who, putting his head through the window, demanded in a stern tone the cause of his absence?

Leonard briefly explained.

"I deeply regret your imprudence," replied the grocer; "because I cannot admit you. It is my fixed determination, as you well know, not to suffer any member of my family who may quit my house, to enter it again."

"I shall not attempt to remonstrate with you, sir," replied Leonard. "All I pray of you is to allow me to occupy this hutch, and to act as your porter."

"Willingly," rejoined Mr. Bloundel; "and as you have had the plague you will run no risk of infection. You shall know all that passes within doors, and I only lament that you should have banished yourself from the asylum which I hoped to have afforded you."

After some further conversation between them, a bundle was lowered, containing a change of clothes, and a couple of blankets. On receiving these, he retired to the hutch, and wrapping himself up, in spite of his anxiety, soon sank asleep. He awoke about four o'clock in the morning, oppressed by the recollection of what had occurred during the night. It was just beginning to grow light, and he walked across the street to gaze at the house from which he was exiled. Its melancholy, uninhabited look did not serve to cheer him. It seemed totally altered since he knew it first. The sign which then invited the passers-by to enter and deal with its honest owner, now appeared no longer significant, unless,—and it will be remembered it was the Noah's Ark,—it could be supposed to have reference to those shut up within. Filled with despondency, the apprentice turned away, and scarcely knowing whither he was going, walked towards St. Paul's.

Having passed so much of his time of late in the cathedral, Leonard began to regard it as a sort of home, and resolved to take up his quarters there during his term of banishment. Proceeding to the great western entrance, he seated himself on one of the large blocks of stone placed there by the masons occupied in repairing the exterior of the fane. His eye rested upon the mighty edifice before him, and the clear sparkling light revealed numberless points of architectural grandeur and beauty which he had never before noticed. The enormous buttresses and lofty pinnacles of the central tower were tinged with the beams of the rising sun, and looked as if built of porphyry. While gazing on the summit of this tower, Leonard called to mind the magnificent view he had recently witnessed from it at the same hour, and if a wish could have transported him thither at that moment, he would have enjoyed it again. But as this could not be, he tried to summon before his mental vision the whole glorious prospect,—the broad and shining river, with its moving or motionless craft,—the gardens and noble houses and mighty wharfs on its banks,—the bridge, with its enormous pile of habitations,—the old and picturesque city, with its innumerable towers and spires, and girdle of grey walls,—the green fields and winding lanes leading to the lovely hills around it;—all these arose obedient to his call, and came arrayed in colouring as fresh as that in which they had before appeared to him. While thus occupied, his gaze remained rivetted on the summit of the tower, and he fancied he perceived some one leaning over the balustrade; but as little beyond the upper part of the figure could be discerned, and as it appeared perfectly motionless, he could not be quite sure that his eyes did not deceive him. Having gazed at the object for some minutes, during which it maintained the same attitude, he continued his survey of the pile, and became so engrossed by the sublime emotions inspired by it as to be insensible to aught else.

After awhile, he arose, and was about to proceed towards the portico, when, chancing to look at the top of the tower, he remarked that the figure had disappeared, and while musing on the circumstance, he perceived a man emerge from one of the tall windows in the lower part of the tower roof. It was Solomon Eagle, and he could not doubt he was the person he had beheld. The enthusiast was without his brazier, but carried a long stout staff. He ran along the pointed roof of the nave with inconceivable swiftness, till he reached the vast stone cross, upwards of twelve feet in height, ornamenting the eastern extremity.

Climbing the stone pedestal that supported it, he clasped the cross with his left arm, and extending his staff with his right, described a circle, as if pointing out the walls of the city. He then raised his staff towards Heaven, as if invoking its vengeance, and anon pointed it menacingly downwards. After this, he broke into loud denunciations; but though the apprentice could not hear the words, he gathered their purport from his gestures.

By this time, half-a-dozen masons had assembled and, taking out their implements, commenced working at the blocks of stone. Glancing at the enthusiast, one of them observed with a smile to his companion, "There is Solomon Eagle pronouncing his morning curse upon the city. I wonder whether the judgments he utters against it will come to pass."

"Assuredly they will, Philip Gatford," replied the other mason, gravely; "and I look upon all the work we are now doing as labour thrown away. Was he not right about the plague? Did he not foretel the desolation and destruction that has come upon us? And he will be right, also, about the fire. Since he has doomed it, this cathedral will be consumed by flames, and one stone will not be left standing on another."

"It is strange, Ned Turgis," observed Gatford, "that, though Solomon Eagle may always be seen at daybreak at the top of the tower, or on the roof of the cathedral,—sometimes at one point and sometimes at another,—no one can tell where he hides himself at other times. He no longer roams the streets at night, but you may remember when the officers of justice were in search of him, to give evidence against Mother Malmayns and Chowles, he was not to be found."

"I remember it," replied Turgis; "but I have no doubt he was concealed in some out-of-the-way corner of the cathedral,—perhaps among the immense wooden beams of the roof."

"Or in some secret passage or cell contrived in the thickness of the walls," rejoined the first speaker.—"I say, Ned Turgis, have you heard that Saint Paul's is to be turned into a pest-house?"

"A pest-house!" exclaimed Turgis. "Are you sure you have been rightly informed?—Will service no longer be performed in it?"

"Not in the nave," replied Gatford,—"and it is that part of the structure which is to be set aside for the beds of the sick folk."

Deeply interested by this part of the conversation, Leonard approached the speakers.

"And when will this take place, friend?" he asked.

"That is more than I can tell," replied Gatford; "but there was a meeting of the Dean and Chapter in the Convocation-house yesterday, and I understand they came to the resolution I have mentioned. My comrade here has just asked whether service will continue to be performed in the cathedral? If the plague increases, as there is every likelihood it will, neither dean, prebends, minor canons, nor vicars will attend—and, as it is, they have almost abandoned it. Solomon Eagle will soon be the only preacher in Saint Paul's."

"Shame on them!" exclaimed Leonard Holt.—"at this season, more than at any other, they are bound to attend to their duty."

"So I think," rejoined Gatford; "but I suppose they consider self-preservation the first duty. They aver that all assemblages, whether called together for religious purposes or not, are dangerous, and likely to extend the pestilence."

"And yet crowds are permitted to assemble for purposes of amusement, if not for worship, in these walls," returned Leonard.

"Not so," replied Gatford. "Very few persons come there now, and none for amusement. Paul's Walk is completely deserted. The shops and stalls have been removed, and the pillars to which they were attached are restored to their former appearance."

"I am glad to hear it," rejoined Leonard. "I would far rather that the sacred edifice were converted into a hospital than be what it has been of late,—a den of thieves."

"It was a stable and a magazine of arms in the time of the Commonwealth," remarked Gatford.

"And if Solomon Eagle's forebodings come to pass, it will be a heap of ruins in our own time," rejoined Turgis.

"Not unlikely," replied Gatford. "But I see the prophet of ill has quitted his post, and retired to his hiding-place."

Looking up as this was said, Leonard saw that the enthusiast had disappeared. At this moment, the great door of the cathedral was thrown open, and, quitting the masons, he ascended the broad steps under the portico, and entered the fane, where he found that the information he had received was correct, and that the stalls and other disfigurements to the pillars had been removed. No crowd collected there as heretofore; and, after pacing the solitary aisles for some time, he made inquiries from the verger about Solomon Eagle?

"I know nothing about him," replied the man, reluctantly. "I believe he always appears at daybreak on some part of the roof, but I know no more than you do, where he hides himself. The door of the winding staircase leading to the tower is open. You can ascend it, and search for him, if you think proper."

Acting upon the suggestion, Leonard mounted to the belfry, and from thence to the summit of the tower. After indulging himself with a brief survey of the glorious view around, he descended, and glanced into every cell and chamber as he passed, in the hope of meeting with the enthusiast, but he was disappointed. At length, as he got about half way down, he felt his arm forcibly grasped, and instantly conjecturing who it was, offered no resistance. Without uttering a word, this person dragged him up a few steps, pushed aside a secret door in the wall, and leading him along a dark narrow passage opened another door, and they emerged upon the roof. He then found that his conjecture was correct, and that his mysterious guide was no other than Solomon Eagle.

"I am glad to find you have recovered from the pestilence," said the enthusiast, regarding him with a friendly glance,— "it proves that you are favoured by Heaven. I saw you in the open space before the cathedral this morning, and instantly recognized you. I was in the belfry when you descended, but you did not perceive me, and I wished to be certain you were alone before I discovered myself."

"Have you ceased to roam about the streets at night, and rouse the slumbering citizens to repentance?" asked Leonard.

"For the present I have," returned Solomon Eagle. "But I shall appear again when I am least expected. But now you shall learn why I have brought you hither. Look along those streets," he added, pointing to the thoroughfares opening in different directions. "What see you?"

"I see men piling heaps of wood and coals at certain distances, as if they were preparing bonfires," replied Leonard, "and yet it cannot be. This is no season for such rejoicing."

"It has been supposed by some physicians," replied Solomon Eagle, "that the lighting of many fires will purify the atmosphere, and drive away infection, and therefore the Lord Mayor has given orders that heaps of fuel shall be placed before every house in every street in the city, and that all these heaps shall be kindled at a certain hour. But it will be of no avail. The weather is now fine and settled, and the sky cloudless. But I should not wonder if the offended Deity were to cause the heaviest rain to descend, and extinguish their fires. No; the way to avert the pestilence is not by fire, but by prayer and penitence, by humiliation and fasting. Let this sinful people put on sackcloth and ashes. Let them beseech God by constant prayer to forgive them, and they may prevail,—but not otherwise."

"And when are these fires to be lighted?" asked the apprentice.

"To-night, at midnight," replied Solomon Eagle.

He then took Leonard by the hand, and led him back the same way he had brought him. On reaching the spiral staircase, he said, "If you desire to see a sight such as man has seldom witnessed, ascend to the summit of this tower an hour after midnight, when all these fires are lighted. A small door near the northern entrance shall be left open. It will lead you to the back of the choir, and you must then find your way hither as well as you can."

Murmuring his thanks, Leonard hurried down the spiral staircase, and quitting the cathedral, proceeded to Wood-street. Preparations were everywhere making for carrying the Lord Mayor's orders into effect; and such was the beneficial result anticipated, that a general liveliness prevailed. On reaching his master's residence, he found him at the shutter, curious to know what was going forward; and having informed him, the grocer immediately lowered him money to procure wood and coal.

"I have little faith in the experiment," he said, "but the Lord Mayor's injunctions must be obeyed."

With the help of the porter, Dallison, who had now arrived, Leonard Holt soon procured a large heap of fuel, and placed it in the middle of the street. The day was passed in executing other commissions for his master, and he took his meals in the hutch with the porter. Time appeared to pass with unusual slowness, and not he alone, but anxious thousands impatiently awaited the signal to kindle their fires. The night was profoundly dark and sultry, and Leonard could not help thinking that the enthusiast's prediction would be verified, and that rain would fall. But these gloomy anticipations vanished as the hour of midnight was tolled forth by the neighbouring churches of Saint Michael's and Saint Alban's. Scarcely had the strokes died away, when Leonard seized a light, and set fire to the pile. Ten thousand other piles were kindled at the same moment, and in an instant the pitchy darkness was converted into light as bright as that of noon-day.

Anxious to behold this extraordinary illumination at its best, Leonard Holt committed the replenishing of the pile and the custody of the house to Dallison, and hastened to Saint Paul's. A great fire was burning at each angle of the cathedral, but without pausing to notice the picturesque effect of the flames upon the walls of the building, he passed through the door to which he had been directed, and hastening to the spiral staircase, ascended it with swift steps. He did not stop till he reached the summit of the tower, and there, indeed, a wondrous spectacle awaited him. The whole city seemed on fire, and girded with a flaming belt—for piles were lighted at certain distances along the whole line of walls. Where the streets could not be seen, their course might be traced by the reflection of the flames on the walls and gables of the houses. London-bridge was discernible from the fires burning upon it,—and even upon the river, braziers were lighted on a l the larger craft, which cast a ruddy glow upon the stream.

After gazing at this extraordinary sight for some time, Leonard turned to descend. As yet, he had seen nothing of Solomon Eagle, and, searching for him in vain in the belfry, he quitted the cathedral. From a knot of persons gathered round one of the fires, he learnt that the enthusiast was at the east end of the cathedral, and proceeding thither, perceived him standing on the edge of a stone balustrade. His brazier was fastened on a pinnacle, and partially illumined the magnificent rose window beneath it, and the large clock at one side. Solomon Eagle was evidently denouncing the city, but his words were lost in the distance. As he proceeded, a loud clap of thunder pealed over-head.

"It comes—it comes!" cried the enthusiast, in a voice that could be distinctly heard in the death-like stillness that followed the thunder. "The wrath of Heaven is at hand."

As he spoke, a bright flash cut the air, and a bolt struck down one of the pinnacles of the tower. Flash after flash followed in quick succession, and the enthusiast, who seemed wrapped in flame, extended his arms towards Heaven as if beseeching a further display of its vengeance. Suddenly, the lightning ceased to flash, and the thunder to roll. A few heavy drops of rain fell. These were instantly succeeded by a deluging shower, of such violence that in less than half an hour every fire within the city was extinguished, and all was darkness and despair.

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE SPIRIT IN THE DEAD CART.

THE deepest gloom and despondency prevailed that night throughout London. The sudden storm was regarded as a manifestation of the displeasure of Heaven, and as an intimation that the arrows of its wrath were not to be turned aside by any human efforts. So impressed were all with this feeling, that when, in less than half an hour afterwards, the rain entirely ceased, the clouds cleared off, and the stars again poured down their lustre, no one attempted to re-kindle the fires, fearing to incur the Divine vengeance. Nor was a monitor wanting to enforce the awful lesson they had received. Solomon Eagle, with his brazier on his head, ran through the streets, calling on the inhabitants to take to heart what had happened, —to repent, and prepare for their doom.

"The Lord will not spare you," he cried, stationing himself in the open space before Saint Stephen's, Walbrook; "he will visit your sins upon you. Pray, therefore, that you may not be destroyed both soul and body. Little time is allowed for your repentance. Many that hear me shall not live till to-morrow. Few shall survive the year!"

"Thou, thyself, shalt not survive the night, false prophet," cried a voice from a neighbouring window; and immediately afterwards, the barrel of a gun was thrust forth, and a shot fired against the enthusiast. But the ball missed its mark, and struck a bystander, who fell to the ground, mortally wounded.

"You have killed your own son, Mr. Westwood," cried one of the spectators, rushing to the fallen man. "Who will henceforth doubt that Solomon Eagle is under the care of a special Providence?"

"Not I," replied another spectator; "I shall never disregard his words in future."

Setting down his brazier, the enthusiast bent over the dead man—for dead he was,—and noted a placid smile upon his features. By this time, the unfortunate father had joined the group, and, on seeing the body of his son, wrung his hands in a pitiable manner, and gave utterance to the wildest ejaculations of despair. No one attempted to seize him, till, at length, Solomon Eagle, rising from his kneeling posture, laid his hand upon his arm, and regarding him sternly, said, "What wrong had I done you that you should seek to slay me?"

"What wrong?" rejoined Westwood—"such wrong as can never be repaired. Your fearful prophecies and denunciations so terrified my daughter, that she died distracted. My broken-hearted wife was not long in following her, and now you have made me the murderer of my son. Complete the tragedy, and take my life."

"I have no desire to do so," replied Solomon Eagle, in a tone of commiseration. "My desire is to save your soul, and the souls of all those who surround me. I wonder not that your anger was at first excited against me, but if you had duly considered the matter, indignation would have given way to better feelings. My mission is not to terrify, but to warn. Why will ye thus continue impenitent when ye are spoken to, not by my voice alone, but by a thousand others?—by the thunder—by the rain—by the pestilence!—and ye shall be spoken to, if ye continue obstinate, by fire and by famine. Look at these quenched embers—at these flooded streets—and read in them your doom. Now, mark me what you must do to free the city from this devouring scourge. You must utterly and for ever abandon your evil courses. You must pray incessantly for remission of your sins. You must resign yourselves without repining to such chastisement as you have provoked, and must put your whole trust and confidence in God. Do this, and do it heartily,—it is possible that His wrath may be averted."

"I feel the force of your words," faltered Westwood,—“would I had felt them sooner!”

"Repentance never comes too late," rejoined the enthusiast.

And snatching up his brazier, he continued his course at the same speed as before. The unfortunate father was taken into his own dwelling, whither also the body of his son was conveyed. A strict watch was kept over him during the night, and in the morning he was removed to Newgate, where he perished, in less than a week, of the distemper.

The aspect of the streets on the following day was deplorable enough. Not that the weather was unfavourable. On the contrary, it was bright and sunny, while the heated atmosphere, cooled by the previous showers, felt no longer oppressive. But the sight of the half-burnt fires struck a chill into every bosom, and it was not until the heaps were removed that the more timorous ventured forth at all. The result, too, of the experiment was singularly unfortunate. Whether it was from the extraordinary heat occasioned by the lighting of so many fires, or that the smoke did not ascend, and so kept down the pestilential vapour, or that the number of persons who met together spread the contagion,—certain it was that the pestilence was more widely extended than before, and the mortality fearfully increased.

On the commencement of the storm, Leonard Holt hurried back to Wood-street, and reached his master's dwelling just as the rain began to descend in torrents. Mr. Bloundel was at the window, and a few words only passed between him and the apprentice, when the latter was compelled to take refuge in the hutch. Here he found Dallison, and they listened in awe-struck silence to the heavy showers, and to the hissing of the blazing embers in their struggle against the hostile element. By and bye, the latter sound ceased—not a light could be seen throughout the whole length of the street, nor was there any red reflection, as heretofore, in the sky. It was evident that the numberless fires were extinguished—and the pitiless pelting of the rain, the roar of the water-spouts, and the rush of the over-filled kennels, now converted into rivulets, could alone be heard. After awhile, the storm cleared off, and Leonard and his companion issuing from their retreat, gazed in silence at the drenched heap before them. While thus occupied, the window above opened, and the grocer appeared at it.

"This is, indeed, a sad and striking lesson," he said, "and I hope will not be lost upon those who have witnessed it. It shows the utter impotency of struggling against the Divine will, and that when man relies upon himself for preservation, he depends upon a broken reed. If I did not place myself under Heaven's protection, I should be sure that all my own precautions were unavailing. I am now about to call up my family to prayer. You can join us in our supplications, and I trust they will not be unheard."

Closing the window, the grocer retired, and Leonard returned to the hutch, where he fell upon his knees, and as soon as he supposed the family were gathered together, commenced his own prayers. It was no slight consolation to him to think that, though absent from Amabel, his voice ascended to Heaven coupled with hers.

On rejoining Dallison, he found him conversing with a person, who proved to be Doctor Hodges. The physician expressed great surprise at seeing him, and inquired how he came to have left his master's house. Leonard told him all that had happened, and besought his assistance in Nizza's behalf.

"I will do all I can," replied Hodges, "for I feel greatly interested about her. But who is this Sir Paul Parravicin? I never heard of him."

"I know nothing more than what I have told you," replied Leonard. "He is a friend of the Earl of Rochester."

"It must be a feigned name," rejoined Hodges; "but I will not rest till I discover him. You shall lodge at my house to-night. It will be better for you than sleeping in that damp box. But I must have a word or two with your master. I have been abroad all night, and came hither to ascertain what he had done. How do you give the signal to him?"

"There is a cord within the hutch by which you can sound a bell within his chamber," returned Leonard. "I will ring it."

Accordingly, he did so, and the summons was almost instantly answered by the grocer. A cordial greeting passed between the latter and Hodges, who inquired whether all was going on satisfactorily within, and whether any thing could be done for the family.

"I would not have disturbed you at this unseasonable hour," he added, "but chancing to be in your neighbourhood, and thinking it likely you would be on the watch, I came to have a word with you. Though I could not foresee what would happen, I entirely disapproved of these fires, as likely to increase rather than check the pestilence."

"The hand of Heaven has extinguished them, because they were lighted in opposition to its decrees," replied Bloundel. "But you have asked me if all is going well within. I should answer readily in the affirmative, if my wife did not express much anxiety respecting Amabel. She entertains great fears for her health, and thinks the confinement too much for her. What would you recommend?"

"I must see her to be able to speak confidently," replied Hodges.

"I know not how that can be accomplished, unless you choose to ascend by a basket attached to the pulley," replied the grocer, with some hesitation—"and it is against my plan to admit you."

"But your daughter's life, my good friend," rejoined Hodges,—“think of that. If I choose to risk life and limb to visit her, you may risk the chance of contagion to admit me. But you need have no fear. Sprinkle your room with spirits of sulphur, and have a phial of vinegar in readiness, so that I can use it on my first entrance, and I will answer for the safety of your family."

These preparations made, Mr. Bloundel lowered the basket, into which Hodges got, and grasping the rope, not without some misgiving on his part, he suffered himself to be drawn up. Leonard witnessed his ascent with a beating heart, and could scarcely repress a feeling of envy when he saw him pass through the window, and knew he would so soon be in the presence of Amabel. But this feeling was quickly lost in uneasiness, and he became all anxiety to learn the doctor's opinion of her. He was kept in a painful state of suspense for nearly an hour, when voices were heard at the window, and presently afterwards Hodges was carefully let down. Bidding the grocer farewell, he desired Leonard to follow him, and led the way towards Cheapside. They proceeded a short distance in silence, when the latter ventured to remark, "You say nothing about Amabel, sir? I fear, from your silence, that you found her seriously indisposed?"

"Do not question me about her just now," rejoined the doctor, somewhat sharply. "I would rather not discuss the matter."

Nothing more was said, and as soon as they reached the doctor's residence Leonard was shown to a comfortable bed.

It was late when he awoke next day, and as the doctor was gone forth, he partook of a plentiful breakfast which was placed before him, and repaired to Wood-street, but his master having no commissions for him to execute, he went back again. By this time, Doctor Hodges had returned, and calling him into the library, told him he wished to speak with him.

"You were right last night," he said, "in inferring from my silence that I was alarmed about Amabel. In truth, I fear she is rapidly sinking into a decline—and nothing will arrest the progress of the insidious disease, but instant removal to the country. To this she will not consent, neither do I know how it could be accomplished. It is pitiable to see so lovely a creature dying, as I fear she is, of a broken heart."

"Did you inform her father of her danger?" demanded Leonard, in a voice of the deepest emotion.

"She extorted a promise of secrecy from me," rejoined Hodges; "and as she declared that no consideration should induce her to leave the house, I thought it needless to alarm him."

Leonard covered his face with his hands, and wept aloud.

"We have not spoken of Nizza Macasree," said Hodges, after a pause, and tapping him kindly on the shoulder. "I think I have discovered a trace of her."

"I am glad to hear it," replied Leonard, rousing himself. "She is another victim of these profligates. But I will be revenged upon them all."

"I have before enjoined you to restrain your indignation, just though it be," returned Hodges. "I have not yet found Nizza's retreat, but I have a clue to it, which must, I think, lead to her discovery. But I must now dismiss you. I have other affairs to attend to, and must give a dangerous and difficult case on which I have been consulted undisturbed consideration. Make my house your home as long as you think proper."

Warmly thanking the doctor, Leonard then withdrew. Shortly after this, he walked forth, and ascertaining that he was not required by his master, determined to satisfy himself by actual observation of the extent of the ravages of the plague.

With this view, he shaped his course along Lad-lane, and traversing Cateaton-street, entered Lothbury. The number of houses which he here found closed, with red crosses on the doors, and the fatal inscription above them, convinced him that the accounts he had heard were not exaggerated. In passing some of these habitations, he saw such ghastly faces at the windows, and heard such lamentable cries, that he was glad to hurry on and get out of sight and hearing. In Throgmorton-street, nearly opposite Drapers'-hall, a poor wretch suddenly opened a casement, and before his attendants could force him back, threw himself from a great height and broke his neck. Another incident of an equally distressing nature occurred. A young and richly dressed man issued from a tavern in Broad-street, and with a wild and inflamed countenance staggered along. He addressed some insulting language to Leonard, but the latter, who desired no quarrel, disregarded his remarks, and let him pass. The next person encountered by the drunkard was a young female. Suddenly catching her in his arms, he imprinted a kiss upon her lips, and then, with a frightful laugh, shouted, "I have the plague! Why should not you have it as well as me? You doubt my words. Look here!" And tearing aside the collar of his shirt, he exhibited a large tumour. The young woman uttered a shriek of terror, and fainted, while her assailant took to his heels, and running as long as his strength lasted, fell down, and was taken to the pest-house, where he was joined the same night by his victim. And this was by no means an uncommon occurrence. The distemper acted differently on different temperaments. Some it inflamed to an ungovernable pitch of madness—others it reduced to the depths of despair—while, in many cases, it brought out and aggravated the worst parts of the character. Wives conveyed the infection intentionally to their husbands—husbands to their wives—parents to their children—lovers to the objects of their affection—while, as in the case above-mentioned, many persons ran about the streets, like rabid hounds, striving to communicate it to all they met.

Greatly shocked by what had occurred, and yet not altogether surprised at it, for his mind had become familiarized with horrors, Leonard struck down Finch-lane, and proceeded towards Cornhill. On the way he noticed two dead bodies lying at the mouth of a small alley, and hastening past, was stopped at the entrance to Cornhill, by a butcher's apprentice, who was wheeling away the body of an old man, who had just died, while purchasing meat at a stall at Stock's Market. Filled with unutterable loathing at this miserable spectacle, Leonard was fain to turn into the nearest tavern, and procure a glass of canary to recruit his spirits.

As he entered the room, a lively strain of music burst upon his ear, and glancing in the direction of the sound, he found it proceeded from the blind piper, Mike Macascree, who was playing to some half-dozen roystering youths. Bell lay at her master's feet, and as Leonard approached the party, pricked up her ears, and being called by name, instantly sprang towards him, and manifested the strongest delight. The piper stopped playing, to listen to what was going forward, but the young men urged him to proceed, and again filled his glass.

"Don't drink any more, friend," said Leonard, "but step aside with me. I've something to say to you—something about your daughter."

"My daughter!" exclaimed the piper, in a half-angry, half-sorrowful voice, while a slight moisture forced itself through his orbless lids—"I don't want to hear anything about her, except that she is dead. She has deserted me, and disgraced herself."

"You are mistaken," rejoined Leonard, "and if you will come with me, I will explain all to you."

"I will listen to no explanation," rejoined the piper, furiously—"she has given me pain enough already. I'm engaged with this jovial company. Fill my glass, my masters—there, fill it again," he added, draining it eagerly, and with the evident wish to drown his cares. "You shall now have such a tune as was never listened to by mortal ears."

A loud laugh from the young men followed this sally, and the piper played away so furiously that it added to their merriment. Touched with compassion, Leonard walked aside, hoping, when the company withdrew, to be able to have a word with the poor man. But the piper's excitement increased. He played faster and drank harder, until it was apparent he was no longer in a condition to speak rationally. Leonard therefore addressed himself to the drawer, and desired him to give the piper a night's lodging at his expense, adding, that he would return before midnight to see how he got on. The drawer promising compliance, Leonard departed; and not feeling disposed to continue his walk, returned to Wood-street.

Nothing particular occurred during the evening. Leonard did not see Doctor Hodges, who was engaged in his professional duties, and after keeping watch before the grocer's till nearly midnight, he again retraced his steps to Cornhill. The drawer was at the door, and about to close the house.

"You will be sorry to learn the fate of the poor piper," he said.

"Why, what has happened to him?" cried Leonard.

"He has died of the plague," replied the drawer.

"What, so suddenly?" exclaimed the apprentice. "You are jesting with me."

"Alas! it is no jest," rejoined the drawer, in a tone that convinced the apprentice of his sincerity. "His entertainers left him a few hours ago, and in spite of my efforts to detain him, he quitted the house and sat down on those steps. Concluding he would fall asleep, I did not disturb him, and his dog kept careful watch over him. I forgot all about him till a short time ago, when hearing the pest cart pass, I went forth, and learnt that the drivers having found him dead—as they supposed of the pestilence,—had placed their forks under his belt and thrown him into the cart."

"And where is his dog?" cried Leonard.

"She would not quit her master," replied the drawer, "so the men threw her into the cart with him, saying they would bury her in the plague-pit, as all dogs were ordered to be destroyed."

"This must be prevented," said Leonard. "Which way did the dead-cart go?"

"Towards Moorgate," replied the drawer.

Without another word, Leonard dashed through a narrow passage opposite the conduit, crossed Bartholomew Lane, and traversing Lothbury, soon reached Coleman-street and the old city gate, to which he had been directed. Here he learnt that the dead-cart had passed through it about five minutes before, and he hurried on towards Finsbury fields. He had not proceeded far when he heard the sound of a pipe at a distance, furiously played, and accompanied by the barking of a dog. These sounds were followed by cries of alarm, and he presently perceived two persons running towards him, at a pace which could only be inspired by terror. One of them carried a lantern, and grasping his arm, the apprentice detained him.

"What is the matter?" he asked.

"The devil's the matter," replied the man—"the piper's ghost has appeared in the cart, and is playing his old tunes again."

"Ay, it's either his spirit, or he is come to life again," observed the other man—"I tossed him into the cart myself, and will swear he was dead enough then."

"You have committed a dreadful mistake," cried Leonard. "You have tossed a living man into the cart, instead of a dead one. Do you not hear those sounds?" And as he spoke, the notes of the pipe swelled into a louder strain than ever.

"I tell you it is the devil—or a ghost," replied the man nearest the apprentice,—"I will stay here no longer."

"Lead me your lantern, and I will go to the cart," rejoined Leonard.

"Take it," replied the man, "but I caution you not to go near the cart. You may receive a shock you will never survive."

Paying no attention to what was said, Leonard ran towards the cart, and found the piper seated upon a pile of dead bodies, most of them stripped of their covering, with Bell by his side, and playing away at a prodigious rate.

CHAPTER XXV.

THE DANCE OF DEATH.

THE condition of the prisons at this season, was really frightful. In Newgate, in particular, where the distemper broke out at the beginning of June, it raged with such violence that in less than a week more than half the prisoners were swept off, and it appeared probable, that, unless its fury abated, not a soul would soon be left alive within it. At the best times, this crowded and ill-kept prison was infested with the gaol fever and other pestilential disorders, but these were mild in comparison with the scourge by which it was now visited. So noisome and infectious was the atmosphere that to breathe it was almost to inhale contagion. The wards were never cleansed, and such poor wretches as died in their cells, were left there till the attendants of the dead-cart chose to drag them forth. No restraint being placed upon the sick, and the rules of the prison allowing them the free use of any strong liquors they had the means of purchasing, the scenes that occurred were too dreadful and revolting for description, and could only be paralleled by the orgies of infernal spirits. Many desperate individuals, conscious that they were smitten by a fatal disease, drank as long as they could raise the cup to their lips, and after committing the wildest and most shocking extravagancies, died in a state of frenzy.

Newgate became thus, as it were, the very centre of infection, where the plague assumed its worst aspect, and where its victims perished far more expeditiously than elsewhere. Two of the turnkeys had already died, and such was the alarm entertained that no one could be found to supply their places. To penetrate the recesses of the prison was almost to ensure destruction, and none but the attendants of the dead cart, and the nurses, attempted it. Among the latter was Judith. Employed as a nurse on the first outbreak of the plague, she willingly and fearlessly undertook the office. So utterly without apprehension was she, that when no one would approach the cell where some wretched sufferer lay expiring, she unhesitatingly entered it. But it was not to render aid, but to plunder, that she thus exercised her functions. She administered no medicine, dressed no tumours, and did not contribute in the slightest degree to the comfort of the unfortunate beings committed to her charge. All she desired was to obtain whatever valuables they possessed, or to wring from them any secret that might afterwards be turned to account. Foreseeing that Newgate must ere long be depopulated, and having no fears for herself, she confidently expected to be then liberated, and to be able once more to renew her mischievous practices upon mankind. Her marvellous preservation throughout all the dangers to which she was exposed seemed almost to warrant the notion entertained by many, that she had entered into a compact with the pestilence to extend it by every means in her power, on condition of being spared herself.

Soon after the outbreak of the plague in Newgate all the debtors were liberated, and if the keepers had had their own way, the common felons would have been likewise released. But this could not be, and they were kept to perish as before described. Matters, however, grew so serious, that it became a question whether they ought to be longer detained, and at last the turnkeys refusing to act, and delivering their keys to the governor, the few miserable wretches left alive, together with Chowles and Judith, were set free.

On the night of their liberation, the ruthless pair proceeded to the vaults of Saint Faith's, to deposit within them the plunder they had obtained in the prison. They found them entirely deserted. Neither verger, sexton, nor any other person, was to be seen, and Judith determined to take up her quarters in the crypt once occupied by her husband. Having brought a basket of provisions and a few bottles of wine with them, they determined to pass the night in revelry; and accordingly, having lighted a fire with the fragments of old coffins brought from the adjoining charnel, they sat down to their meal.

Having done full justice to it, and disposed of the first flask, they were abandoning themselves to unrestrained enjoyment, when their glee was all at once suspended by hearing a strange and unaccountable noise in the adjoining church. Chowles, who was chanting one of his wild melodies, suddenly stopped, and Judith set down the glass she had raised to her lips, untasted. What could it mean? Neither of them could tell. It seemed like strains of unearthly music, mixed with shrieks and groans as of tortured spirits, accompanied by peals of such laughter as might be supposed to proceed from demons.

"The dead are burst forth from their tombs," cried

Chowles, in a trembling voice, "and are attended by a legion of evil spirits."

"It would seem so," replied Judith, rising—"I should like to behold the sight. Come with me."

"Not for the world!" rejoined Chowles, shuddering, "and I beseech you to stay where you are. You may behold your husband among them."

"Do you think so?" rejoined Judith, halting.

"I am sure of it," cried Chowles, eagerly. "Stay where you are,—stay where you are."

As he spoke, there was another peal of infernal laughter, and the strains of music waxed louder each moment.

"I will see what it is," said Judith, emptying her glass, as if seeking courage from the draught. "Surely," she added, in a taunting tone, "you will come with me."

"I am afraid of nothing earthly," rejoined Chowles, but I do not like to face beings of another world."

"Then I will go alone," rejoined Judith.

"Nay, that shall never be," replied Chowles, tottering after her.

As they opened the door, and crossed the chancel, such an extraordinary combination of sounds burst upon their ears that they again paused, and anxiously gazed at each other. The coffin-maker laid his hand on his companion's arm, and strove to detain her, but she would not be stayed, and he was forced to go on. Setting down the lamp on the stone floor, Judith passed into the subterranean church, where she beheld a sight that almost petrified her. In the midst of the nave, which was illuminated by a blue glimmering light, whence proceeding it was impossible to determine, stood a number of grotesque figures, apparelled in fantastic garbs, and each attended by a skeleton. Some of the latter grisly shapes were beating tambours, others playing on psalteries, others on rebecs—every instrument producing the strangest sound imaginable.

Viewed through the massive pillars, beneath that sombre and ponderous roof, and by the mystic light before described, this strange company had a supernatural appearance, and neither Chowles nor Judith doubted for a moment that they beheld before them a congregation of phantoms. An irresistible feeling of curiosity urged them to advance. On drawing nearer, they found that the assemblage comprehended all ranks of society. There was a pope, in his tiara and pontifical dress; a cardinal, in his cap and robes; a king, with a sceptre in his hand, and arrayed in the habiliments of royalty; a crowned queen; a bishop, wearing his mitre, and carrying his crosier; an abbot, likewise in his mitre and crosier; a duke, in his robes of state; a grave canon of the church; a knight, sheathed in armour; a judge, an advocate, and a magistrate, all in their robes; a mendicant friar and a nun; and the list was completed by a physician, an astrologer, a miser, a merchant, a pedlar, a soldier, a gamester, an idiot, a robber, a blind man, and a beggar, each distinguishable by his garb.

Chowles and his companion gazed at the ghostly company in mute wonder, expecting something extraordinary to happen. Nor were they disappointed. With a wild and gibbering laugh that chilled the coffin-maker's blood in his veins, one of the tallest and grisliest of the skeletons sprang forward, and beating his drum, the whole assemblage formed, two and two, into a line—a skeleton placing itself on the right of every mortal. In this order, the fantastic procession marched between the pillars, the unearthly music playing all the while, and disappeared at the farther extremity of the church. With the last of the group the mysterious light vanished, and Chowles and his companion were left in profound darkness.

"What can it mean?" cried Judith, as soon as she recovered her speech. "Are they human beings, or spirits?"

"Human beings don't generally amuse themselves in this way," returned Chowles. "But hark!—I still hear the music.—They are above—in Saint Paul's."

"Then I will join them," said Judith. "I am resolved to see the end of it."

"Don't leave me behind," returned Chowles. "I would rather keep company with the devil than be alone."

Both were too well acquainted with the way to need any light. Ascending the broad stone staircase, they presently emerged into the cathedral, which they found illumined by the same glimmering light as the lower church, and they perceived the ghostly assemblage gathered into an immense ring, and dancing round the tall skeleton, who continued beating his drum and uttering a strange gibbering sound, which was echoed by the others. Each moment the dancers increased the swiftness of their pace, until at last it grew to a giddy whirl, and then, all at once, with a shriek of laughter, the whole company fell to the ground.

Chowles and Judith, then, for the first time, understood, from the confusion that ensued and the exclamations uttered, that they were no spirits they had to deal with, but beings of the same mould as themselves. Accordingly, they approached the masquers, for such they proved, and found on inquiry that they were a party of young gallants, who, headed by the Earl of Rochester—the representative of the tall skeleton—had determined to realize the Dance of Death, as once depicted in an ancient cloister on the north of the cathedral, called Pardon Church-yard, on the walls of which, says Stowe, were "artificially and richly painted the Dance of Macaber, or Dance of Death, commonly called the Dance of Paul's, the like whereof was painted about Saint Innocent's, at Paris. The metres or poesy of this dance," proceeds the same authority, "were translated out of French into English by John Lydgate, monk of Bury; and with the picture of Death leading all estates, painted about the cloister, at the special request and expense of Jenkin Carpenter, in the reign of Henry the Sixth." Pardon Church-yard was pulled down by the Protector Somerset, in the reign of Edward the Sixth, and the materials employed in the erection of his own palace in the Strand. It was the discussion of these singular paintings, and of the designs on the same subject by Holbein, that led the Earl of Rochester and his companions to prepare the fantastic masque above described. With the disposition which this reckless nobleman possessed to turn the most solemn and appalling subjects to jest, he thought no season so fitting for such a pageant as the present—just as in our own time the lively Parisians made the cholera, while raging in their city, the subject of a carnival pastime. What Chowles and Judith witnessed, was a rehearsal of the masque intended to be represented in the cathedral on the following night.

Again marshalling his band, the Earl of Rochester beat his drum, and skipping before them, led the way to the south door of the cathedral, which was thrown open by an unseen hand, and the procession glided through it like so many spectres. Chowles, whose appearance was not unlike that of a living skeleton, was seized with a strange desire to join in what was going forward, and taking off his doublet, and baring his bony arms and legs, followed the procession, dancing round Judith in the same manner that the other skeletons danced round their partners.

On reaching the Convocation House, a door was opened, and the procession entered the cloisters; and here Chowles, dragging Judith into the area between him and the beautiful structure they surrounded, began a dance of so extraordinary a character, that the whole troop collected round to witness it. Rochester beat his drum, and the other representatives of mortality who were provided with musical instruments struck up a wild kind of accompaniment, to which Chowles executed the most grotesque and fantastic flourishes. So wildly excited did he become, and such extravagances did he commit, that even Judith stared at him, and began to think his wits were gone. Now he whirled round her—now sprang high into the air—now twined his lean arms round her waist—now peeped over one shoulder, now over the other—and at last gripped her neck so forcibly that he would infallibly have strangled her, if she had not broke from him, and struck him so severe a blow that he fell senseless to the ground.

On recovering, he found himself in the arched entrance of a large octagonal chamber, lighted at each angle by a lofty pointed window, filled with stained glass. Round the sides of this chamber ran a stone bench, with a richly carved back of the same material, on which the masquers were seated, and opposite the entrance was a raised seat, ordinarily allotted to the dean, but now occupied by the Earl of Rochester. A circular table stood in the midst of the apartment, covered with magnificent silver dishes, heaped with the choicest viands, which were handed to the guests by the Earl's servants, all of whom represented skeletons, and it had a strange effect to behold these ghastly objects filling up the cups of the revellers, bending obsequiously before some blooming dame, or crowding round their spectral-looking lord.

At first, Chowles was so confused that he thought he must have awakened in another world, but by degrees he called to mind what had occurred, and ascertained from Judith that he was in the Convocation House. Getting up, he joined the train of grisly attendants, and acquitted himself so satisfactorily that the Earl engaged him as performer in the masque. He was furthermore informed that, in all probability, the King himself, with many of his favourite nobles, and the chief beauties of the court, would be present to witness the spectacle.

The banquet over, intimation was given that chairs and coaches were without, and the company departed—excepting a few attendants, who remained behind to put matters in order.

While they were thus occupied, Judith fixed her greedy eyes upon the plate, observing to Chowles, in an under tone—"There will be fine plunder for us. We must manage to carry off all that plate while they are engaged in the masque."

"You must do it yourself, then," returned Chowles, in the same tone. "I have to play a principal part in the pageant, and as the King himself will be present, I cannot give up such an opportunity of distinguishing myself."

"You can have no share in the prize if you lend no help," replied Judith, with a dissatisfied look.

"Of course not," rejoined Chowles—"on this occasion it shall be all yours. This masque is too much to my taste to be given up."

Perceiving they were noticed, Chowles and Judith then left the Convocation House, and returned to the vault in Saint Faith's, nor did they emerge from it until late on the following day.

Some rumour of the masque having gone abroad, towards evening a crowd, chiefly composed of the most worthless class of society, collected under the portico at the east of the cathedral, and the great doors being opened by Chowles, they entered the structure. Thus was this sacred building once more invaded—once again a scene of noise, riot, and confusion—its vaulted roof, instead of echoing the voice of prayer, or the choral hymn, resounding with loud laughter, imprecations, and licentious discourse. This disorder, however, was kept in some bounds by a strong body of the royal guard, who arrived about an hour before midnight, and stationing themselves in parties of three or four at each of the massive columns flanking the aisles, endeavoured to maintain order. Besides these, there were others of the royal attendants bearing torches, who walked from place to place, and compelled all loiterers in dark corners to proceed to the nave.

A little before midnight, the great doors were again thrown open, and a large troop of richly attired persons, all wearing masks, entered the cathedral. For a short time, they paced to and fro between its shafted pillars, gazing at the spectators grouped around, and evidently from their jests and laughter, not a little entertained by the scene. As the clock struck twelve, however, all sounds were hushed, and the courtly party stationed themselves on the steps leading to the choir. At the same moment, also, the torches were extinguished, and the whole of the building buried in darkness. Presently after, a sound was heard as of a number of persons moving across the nave, but nothing could be discerned. Expectation was kept on the rack for some minutes, during which many a stifled cry was heard from those whose courage failed them at this trying juncture. All at once, a blue light illuminated the nave, and partially revealed the lofty pillars by which it was surrounded. By this light, the whole of the ghostly group could be discerned drawn up near the eastern entrance. They were arranged two and two, a skeleton standing, as before, on the right of each character. The procession next marched slowly and silently towards the choir, and drew up at the steps to give the royal party an opportunity of examining them. After pausing there for a few minutes, Rochester, in his grisly attire, started off, and beating his drum, was followed by the Pope and his attendant skeleton. This couple, having danced together for some minutes to the infinite diversion of the spectators, disappeared behind a pillar, and were succeeded by the Emperor and a second skeleton. These in their turn gave way to the Cardinal and his companion, and so on till the whole of the masquers had exhibited themselves, when at a signal from the Earl, the party re-appeared, and forming a ring round him, executed their dance with such spirit as to elicit tumultuous applause from the beholders. After a while, the Earl retired, and Chowles took his place. He was clothed in a tight elastic dress, painted of a leaden and cadaverous colour, and fitting tight to his bony figure. He carried an hour-glass in one hand, and a dart in the other, and in the course of the dance kept continually pointing the latter at those whirling around him. His feats of the previous evening were nothing to his present performance. His joints creaked, and his eyes flamed like burning coals. As he continued, his excitement increased. He bounded higher, and his countenance assumed so hideous an expression, that those near him recoiled in terror, crying, "Death had broken loose among them." The consternation soon became general. The dancers fled in dismay, and scampered along the aisles scarcely knowing whither they were going. Delighted with the alarm he had occasioned, Chowles chased a large party along the northern aisle, and was pursuing them across the transept to which it led, when he was arrested in his turn by another equally formidable figure, who suddenly placed himself in his path.

"Hold!" exclaimed Solomon Eagle,—for it was the enthusiast,—in a voice of thunder. "It is time this scandalous exhibition should cease. Know all ye who make a mockery of Death that his power will be speedily and fearfully approved upon you. Think not to escape the vengeance of the Great Being, whose temple ye have profaned. And you, O King! who have countenanced these evil doings by your presence, and who by your own dissolute life have set a pernicious example to your subjects, know that your city shall be utterly laid waste, first by plague, and then by fire. Tremble! my warning is as terrible and as true as the hand-writing on the wall."

"Who art thou who holdest this language towards me?" demanded Charles.

"I am called Solomon Eagle," replied the enthusiast, "and am charged with a mission from on high to warn your doomed people of their fate. Be warned yourself, sire. Your end will be sudden. You will be snatched away in the midst of your pleasures, and with little time for repentance. Be warned, I say again."

With this, he turned to depart.

"Secure the knave," shouted Charles. "I would question him further."

But bursting through the guard, Solomon Eagle ran swiftly up the choir and disappeared, nor could his pursuers discover any traces of him.

"Strange!" exclaimed the King. "Let us go to supper. This masque has given me the vapours."

"Pray heaven it have not given us the plague," observed Killigrew, who stood beside him.

"It is to be hoped not," rejoined Charles; "but, odds fish! it is a most dismal affair."

"It is so, in more ways than one," replied Rochester, "for I have just learnt that all my best plate has been carried off from the Convocation House. I shall only be able to offer your Majesty a sorry supper."

CHAPTER XXVI.

THE PLAGUE PIT.

ON being made acquainted by Leonard, who helped him out of the pest-cart, with the danger he had run, the piper uttered a cry of terror, and swooned away. The buriers, seeing how matters stood, and that their superstitious fears were altogether groundless, now returned, and one of them, producing a phial of vinegar, sprinkled the fainting man with it, and speedily brought him to himself. But though he was so far recovered, his terror had by no means abated, and he declared his firm conviction that he was infected by the pestilence.

"I have been carried towards the plague-pit by mistake," he said. "I shall soon be conveyed thither in right earnest, and not have the power of frightening away my conductors on the road."

"Poh! poh!" cried one of the buriers, jestingly, "I hope you will often ride with us, and play us many a merry tune as you go. You shall always be welcome to a seat in the cart."

"Be of good cheer," added Leonard, "and all will be well. If you will come with me to an apothecary's shop, I will procure a cordial for you which will speedily dispel your qualms."

The piper shook his head, and replied, with a deep groan, that he was certain all was over with him.

"However, I will not reject your kindness," he added, "though I feel I am past the help of medicine."

With this, he whistled to Bell, who was skipping about Leonard, having recognised him on his first approach, and they proceeded toward the second postern in London-wall, between Moorgate and Cripplegate; while the buriers, laughing heartily at the adventure, took their way towards the plague-pit and discharged their dreadful load within it.

Arrived in Basinghall-street, and looking around, Leonard soon discovered by the lanterns suspended before the door, as well as by the crowd collected at it,—for day and night the apothecaries' dwellings were besieged by the sick,—the shop of which he was in search. It was long before they could obtain admittance, and during this time the piper said he felt himself getting rapidly worse, but imagining he was merely labouring under the effect of fright, Leonard paid little attention to his complaints. The apothecary, however, no sooner set eyes upon him than he pronounced him infected, and on examination, it turned out that the fatal tokens had already appeared.

"I knew it was so," cried the piper. "Take me to the pest-house—take me to the pest-house!"

"His desire had better be complied with," observed the apothecary. "He is able to walk thither now, but I would not answer for his doing so two hours hence. It is a bad case," he added, in an under-tone, to Leonard.

Feeling the apothecary, Leonard set out with the piper, and passing through Cripplegate, they entered the open fields. Here they paused for a moment, and the little dog ran round and round them, barking gleefully.

"Poor Bell!" cried the piper; "what will become of thee when I am gone!"

"If you will entrust her to me, I will take care of her," replied Leonard.

"She is yours," rejoined the piper, in a voice hoarse with emotion. "Be kind to her for my sake, and for the sake of her unfortunate mistress."

"Since you have alluded to your daughter," returned Leonard, "I must tell you what has become her. I have not hitherto mentioned the subject, fearing it might distress you."

"Have no further consideration, but speak out," rejoined the piper. "I will try to bear it like a man."

Leonard then briefly recounted all that had occurred describing Nizza's disguise as a page, and her forcible abduction by Parravicin. His relation was frequently interrupted by the groans of his hearer, who at last gave vent to his rage and anguish in words.

"Heaven's direst curse upon her ravisher!" he cried. "May he endure worse misery than he has inflicted upon me! She is lost for ever."

"She may yet be preserved," rejoined Leonard; "Doctor Hodges thinks he has discovered her retreat, and neither he nor I will rest till we find her."

"No—no, you will never find her," replied the piper; "or if you do, it will be only to bewail her ruin."

His rage then gave way to such an access of grief, that letting his head fall on Leonard's shoulder, he wept aloud.

"There is a secret connected with that poor girl," he said, at length, subduing his emotion, "which must now go to the grave with me. The knowledge of it would only add to her misery."

"You view the matter too unfavourably," replied Leonard; "and if the secret is of any moment, I entreat you to confide it to me. If your worst apprehensions should prove well founded, I promise you it shall never be revealed to her."

"On that condition only I confide it to you," replied the piper; "but not now—not now—to-morrow morning, if I am alive."

"It may be out of your power then," returned Leonard. "For your daughter's sake I urge you not to delay."

"Come along—come along!" rejoined the piper, turning a deaf ear to his entreaties, and hurrying forward. "Are we far from the pest-house? My strength is failing me."

On arriving at their destination, they were readily admitted to the asylum, but a slight difficulty arose, which, however, was speedily obviated. All the couches were filled, but on examining them, it was found that one of the sick persons had just been released from his sufferings, and the body being removed, the piper was allowed to take its place. Leonard remained by him for a short time, but overpowered by the pestilential atmosphere, and by the sight of so many miserable objects, he was compelled to seek the open air. Returning, however, shortly afterwards, he found the piper in a very perturbed state. On hearing Leonard's voice he appeared greatly relieved, and taking his gown from beneath his pillow, gave it to him, and desired him to unrip a part of the garment, in which it was evident something was sewn. The apprentice complied, and a small packet dropped forth.

"Take it," said the piper; "and if I die, and Nizza should happily be preserved from her ravisher, give it to her. But not otherwise—not otherwise. Implore her to forgive me—to pity me."

"Forgive you—her father!" cried Leonard, in astonishment.

"The packet will explain all," replied the piper, in a troubled tone. "You promised to take charge of poor Bell," he added, drawing forth the little animal, who had crept to the foot of the bed. "Here she is. Farewell! my faithful friend," he added, pressing his rough lips to her silky forehead, while she whined piteously, as if beseeching him to let her remain; "farewell, for ever!"

"Not for ever, I trust," replied Leonard, taking her gently from him.

"And now you had better go," said the piper. "Return, if you can, to-morrow."

"I will,—I will," replied Leonard. And he hurried out of the room.

He was followed to the door by a young surgeon—the same who had attended Mr. Bloundel,—and he inquired of him if he thought the piper's case utterly hopeless.

"Not utterly so," replied the young man. "I shall be able to speak more certainly in a few hours. At present, I think, with care and attention, there is a chance of his recovery."

Much comforted by this assurance, Leonard departed, and afraid to put Bell to the ground, lest she should run back to her master, he continued to carry her, and endeavoured to attach her to him by caresses and endearments. The little animal showed her sense of his kindness by licking his hands, but she still remained inconsolable, and ever and anon struggled to get free. Making the best of his way to Wood-street, Leonard entered the hutch, and placing a little straw in the corner for Bell, threw himself on a bench, and dropped asleep.

At six o'clock, he was awakened by the barking of the dog, and opening the door, beheld Dallison. The grocer was at the window above, and about to let down a basket of provisions to them. To Leonard's inquiries after Amabel, Mr. Bloundel replied by a melancholy shake of the head, and soon afterwards withdrew. With a sad heart, the apprentice then broke his fast, not forgetting at the same time the wants of his little companion, and finding he was not required by his master, proceeded to Doctor Hodges's residence. He was fortunate enough to find the friendly physician at home, and after relating to him what had occurred, gave the packet to his custody.

"It will be safer in your keeping than mine," he said, "and if any thing should happen to me, you will, I am sure, scrupulously observe the wishes of the poor piper."

"You may rely upon it I will," replied Hodges. "I lament to say I have been misled as to the clue I fancied I had obtained to his daughter's retreat. We are as far from the mark as ever!"

"Might not the real name of the villain who has assumed the title of Sir Paul Parravicin be ascertained from the Earl of Rochester," rejoined Leonard.

"So I thought," replied Hodges, "and I made the attempt yesterday, but it failed. I was at Whitehall, and finding the Earl in the King's presence, suddenly asked him where I could find his friend Sir Paul Parravicin. He looked surprised at the question, glanced significantly at the monarch, and then carelessly replied that he knew no such person."

"A strange idea crosses me," cried Leonard. "Can it be the King who has assumed this disguise?"

"At one time I suspected as much," rejoined Hodges, "but I am now satisfied I was in error. After all, I should not wonder if poor Bell," patting her long silky ears, as she lay in the apprentice's arms, "should help us to discover her mistress. And now," he added, "I shall go to Wood-street to inquire after Amabel, and will then accompany you to the pest-house. From what you tell me the young surgeon said of the piper, I do not despair of his recovery."

"Poor as his chance may appear, I fear it is better than Amabel's," said the apprentice.

"Ah!" exclaimed Hodges, in a sorrowful tone—"Hers is slight, indeed!"

And perceiving that the apprentice was greatly moved, he waited for a moment till he had recovered himself, and then, motioning him to follow him, they quitted the house together.

On reaching Mr. Bloundel's habitation, Leonard, pulled the cord in the hutch, and the grocer appeared at the window.

"My daughter has not left her bed this morning," he said in answer to the doctor's inquiries, "and I fear she is much worse. My wife is with her. It would be a great satisfaction to us if you would see her again."

After some little hesitation, Hodges assented, and was drawn up as before. He returned in about half an hour, and his grave countenance convinced Leonard that his worst anticipations were correct. He, therefore, forbore to question him, and they walked towards Cripplegate in silence.

On emerging into the fields, Hodges observed to his companion, "It is strange that I, who daily witness such dreadful suffering, should be so much struck, so much pained by the gradual and easy decline of Amabel. But so it is. Her case touches me more than the worst I have seen of the plague."

"I can easily account for the feeling," groaned Leonard.

"I am happy to say I have prevailed on her, if she does not improve in a short time,—and there is not the slightest chance of it,—to try the effect of a removal to the country," pursued Hodges. "Her father, also, consents to the plan."

"I am glad to hear it," replied Leonard. "But whither will she go? and who will watch over her?"

"That is not yet settled," rejoined Hodges.

"Oh! that I might be permitted to undertake the office!" cried Leonard, passionately.

"Restrain yourself," said Hodges, in a tone of slight rebuke, "fitting attendance will be found—if needed."

The conversation then dropped, and they walked briskly forward. They were now within a short distance of the pest-house, and Leonard, hearing footsteps behind, turned and beheld a closed litter, borne by two stout porters, and evidently containing a plague-patient. He stepped aside to let it pass, when Bell, suddenly pricking her ears, uttered a singular cry, and bursting from him, flew after the litter, leaping against it and barking joyfully. The porters, who were proceeding at a quick pace, tried to drive her away, but without effect, and she continued her cries until they reached the gates of the pest-house.

"What can be the matter?" said Leonard, who had vainly whistled to her and called her back.

"I almost begin to fear," said Hodges, unable to repress a shudder, "that the poor animal will, indeed, be the means of discovering for us the object of our search."

"I understand what you mean," rejoined Leonard "and am of the same opinion as yourself. Heaven grant we may be mistaken!"

So saying, he ran forward, and, followed by Hodges, reached the pest-house just as the litter was taken into it.

"Silence that accursed dog," cried one of the porters, "and bid a nurse attend us. We have a female patient inside."

"Let me see her," cried Hodges. "I am a physician."

"Readily, sir," replied the porter. "It is almost over with her, poor soul. It would have saved time and trouble to take her to the plague-pit at once. She cannot last many hours. Curse the dog! will it never cease barking?"

Leonard here seized Bell, fearing she might do some mischief, and with a dreadful foreboding beheld the man draw back the curtains of the litter. His fears proved well founded. There, stretched upon the couch, with her dark hair unbound, and flowing in wild disorder over her neck, lay Nizza Macascree. Her face was ghastly pale, which, however, could not rob it of its beauty, and her dark eyes were glazed and lustreless. At the sight of her mistress, poor Bell uttered so piteous a cry, that Leonard, moved by compassion, placed her on the pillow near her, and the sagacious animal did not attempt to approach nearer, but merely licked her cheek. Roused by the touch, Nizza turned to see what was near her, and recognising the animal, uttered a cry of delight, and would have strained her to her bosom, but the pain occasioned by the movement was so intense that she sank back with a deep groan.

"From whom did you receive this young woman?" demanded Hodges of one of the porters.

"She was brought to us in this litter by two richly-attired lacqueys," replied the man. "They paid us to carry her here without loss of time."

"You have no idea whose servants they were?" pursued Hodges.

"Not the least," replied the fellow: "but I should judge, from the richness of their dress, that they belonged to some nobleman."

"Did they belong to the royal household?" inquired Leonard.

"No, no," rejoined the man. "I am certain of that."

"The poor girl shall not remain here," said Hodges to the apprentice. "You must convey her to my residence in Great Knight-rider-street," he added to the porters.

"We will convey her wherever you please," replied the men, "if we are paid for our trouble."

And they were about to close the curtains, when Nizza, having caught sight of the apprentice, slightly raised herself, and cried, in a voice of the utmost anxiety, "Is that you, Leonard?"

"It is," he replied, approaching her.

"Then I shall die happy, since I have seen you once more," she said. "Oh, do not stay near me! you may catch the infection."

"Nizza," said Leonard, disregarding the caution, and breathing the words in her ear—"allay my fears—you have not fallen a victim to the villain who carried you away?"

"I have not, Leonard," she replied in the same tone. "I resisted his threats, his importunities, his violence, and would have slain myself rather than have yielded to him. The plague, at length, came to my rescue, and I have reason to be grateful to it, since it has not only delivered me from him, but brought me to you."

"I must now impose silence upon you," said Hodges, placing his finger on his lips; "further conversation will be hurtful."

"One question more and I have done," replied Nizza. "How came Bell with you—and where is my father? Nothing has happened to him?" she continued, observing Leonard's countenance change. "Speak! do not keep me in suspense. Your silence fills me with apprehension. Speak, I implore you! He is dead!"

"No," replied Leonard "he is not dead—but he is an inmate of this asylum."

"Ah!" exclaimed Nizza, falling back senseless upon the pillow.

And in this state she was conveyed with the greatest expedition to the doctor's residence.

Leonard only tarried to visit the piper, whom he found slightly delirious, and unable to hold any conversation with him, and then set out after the litter. Nizza was placed in the best apartment of the doctor's house, and attended by an experienced and trustworthy nurse. But Hodges positively refused to let Leonard see her again, affirming that the excitement was too much for her, and might militate against the chance of her recovery.

"I am not without hopes of bringing her through," he said, "and though it will be a severe struggle, yet as she has youth and a good constitution on her side, I do not despair. If she herself would second me I should be yet more confident."

"How mean you?" inquired Leonard.

"I think if she thought life worth a struggle—if, in short, she believed that you would return her attachment, she would rally," answered Hodges.

"I cannot consent to deceive her thus," rejoined Leonard, sadly. "My heart is fixed elsewhere."

"Your heart is fixed upon one who will soon be in her grave," replied the doctor.

"And with her my affections will be buried," rejoined Leonard, turning away to hide his tears.

So well was the doctor's solicitude rewarded, that three days after Nizza had come under his care, he pronounced her out of danger. But the violence of the attack left her so weak and exhausted that he still would not allow an interview to take place between her and Leonard. During all this time, Bell never left her mistress's side, and her presence was an inexpressible comfort to her. The piper, too, was slowly recovering, and Leonard, who daily visited him, was glad to learn from the young surgeon that he would be able to leave the pest-house shortly. Having ascertained from Leonard that his daughter was under the care of Doctor Hodges and likely to do well, the piper begged so earnestly that the packet might not be delivered to her, that after some consultation with Hodges, Leonard restored it to him. He was delighted to get it back,—felt it carefully over to ascertain that the seals were unbroken, and satisfied that all was right, had it again sewed up in his gown, which he placed under his pillow.

"I would rather disclose the secret to her by word of mouth than in any other way," he said.

Leonard felt doubtful whether the secret would be disclosed at all, but he made no remark.

Night was drawing on as he quitted the pest-house, and he determined to take this opportunity of visiting the great plague-pit, which lay about a quarter of a mile distant, in a line with the church of All-Hallows-in-the-wall, and he accordingly, proceeded in that direction. The pit which he was about to visit was about forty feet long, twenty wide, and twenty deep. Into this tremendous chasm, the dead were thrown, generally stripped of their clothing, and covered with a slight layer of earth and quick lime.

The sun was setting as Leonard slowly proceeded towards this dismal place, and he thought he had never witnessed so magnificent a sight. Indeed, it was remarked that at this fatal season the sunsets were unusually splendid. The glorious orb sank slowly behind Saint Paul's, which formed a prominent object in the view from the fields, and threw its central tower, its massive roof, and the two lesser towers flanking the portico, into strong relief. Leonard gazed at the mighty fabric, which seemed dilated to twice its size, and wondered whether it was possible that it could ever be wholly destroyed, as predicted by Solomon Eagle.

Long after the sun had set, the sky was stained with crimson, and the grey walls of the city were tinged with the same rosy hue. The heat was intense, and Leonard, to cool himself, sat down in the thick grass—for though the crops were ready for the scythe, no mowers could be found,—and gazing upwards, strove to mount in spirit from the tainted earth towards heaven. After awhile he arose, and proceeded towards the plague-pit. The grass was trampled down near it, and there were marks of frequent cart-wheels upon the sod. Great heaps of soil, which had been thrown out of the excavation, lay on either side. Holding a handkerchief steeped in vinegar to his face, Leonard ventured to the brink of the pit. But even this precaution could not counteract the horrible effluvia arising from it. It was more than half-filled with dead bodies, and through the putrid and heaving mass many disjointed limbs and livid faces could be discerned. It was a horrible sight—so horrible, that it possessed a fascination peculiar to itself, and, in spite of his loathing, Leonard lingered to gaze at it. Strange and fantastic thoughts possessed him. He fancied that the legs and arms moved—that the eyes of the corpses opened and glared at him—and that the whole rotting mass was endowed with animation. So appalled was he by this idea that he turned away, and at that moment beheld a vehicle approaching. It was the dead cart, charged with a heavy load to increase the already redundant heap.

The same inexplicable and irresistible feeling of curiosity that induced Leonard to continue gazing upon the loathly objects in the pit, now prompted him to stay and see what would ensue. Two persons were with the cart, and one of them, to Leonard's infinite surprise and disgust, proved to be Chowles. He had no time, however, for the expression of any sentiment, for the cart halted at a distance from him, and its conductors, turning it round, backed it towards the edge of the pit. The horse was then taken out, and Chowles calling to Leonard, the latter involuntarily knelt down to guide its descent, and its grisly load was shot into the gulf below.

CHAPTER XXVII.

THE BROTHERHOOD OF SAINT MICHAEL.

SHOVELLING a sufficient quantity of earth and lime into the pit to cover the bodies, Chowles and his companion departed, leaving Leonard alone. He continued there a few moments longer, and was about to follow them, when a prolonged and piercing cry smote his ear, and looking in the direction of the sound, he perceived a figure running with great swiftness towards the pit. As no pursuers appeared, Leonard could not doubt that this was one of the distracted persons of whom he had heard, and who in the frenzy produced by the intolerable anguish of their sores, would often rush to the plague-pit and bury themselves, and he therefore resolved, if possible, to prevent the fatal attempt. Accordingly, he placed himself in the way of the runner, and endeavoured with outstretched arms to stop him. But the latter dashed him aside with great violence, and hurrying to the brink of the pit, uttered a fearful cry, and exclaiming—"She is here—she is here—I shall find her amongst them," flung himself into the abyss.

As soon as he could shake off the horror inspired by this dreadful action, Leonard ran to the pit, and gazing into it, beheld him by the imperfect light struggling in the horrible mass in which he was partially immersed. The frenzied man had now, however, begun to repent of his rashness, and cried out for aid. But this Leonard found it impossible to render him; and, seeing he must speedily perish if left to himself, he ran after the dead-cart, and overtaking it just as it reached Moor-gate, informed Chowles what had happened, and begged him to return with him.

"There will be no use in helping him out," rejoined Chowles. "We shall have to bring him back in a couple of hours. Let him remain where he is. There is scarcely a night that some crazy being does not destroy himself in the same way. We never concern ourselves about such persons, except to strip them of their clothing."

"Unfeeling wretch," cried Leonard, unable to restrain his indignation. "Give me your fork, and I will pull him out myself."

Instead of yielding up the implement, Chowles flourished it over his head, with the intention of striking the apprentice, but the latter nimbly avoided the blow, and, snatching the fork from his grasp, ran back to the plague-pit. He was followed by Chowles and the burier, who vented their anger in loud oaths and threats. Regardless of their menaces, Leonard fixed the hook in the dress of the struggling man, and exerting all his strength, drew him out of the abyss. He had just lodged him in safety on the brink when Chowles and his companion came up.

"Keep off!" cried Leonard, brandishing the fork as he spoke, "you shall neither commit robbery nor murder here. If you will assist this unfortunate gentleman, I have no doubt you will be well rewarded. If not, get hence, or advance at your peril."

"Well," returned Chowles, who began to fancy something might be made of the matter, "if you think we should be rewarded we would convey the gentleman back to his own home, provided we can ascertain where that is. But I am afraid he may die on the way."

"In that case, you can apply to his friends," rejoined Leonard. "But he must not be abandoned thus."

"First, let us know who he is," returned Chowles. "Is he able to speak?"

"I know not," answered Leonard. "Bring the lantern this way, and let us examine his countenance."

Chowles complied, and threw the light upon the unfortunate person. He was richly attired, but his dress was in great disorder, and sullied by the loathsome mass in which he had been plunged. He was in the flower of youth, and his features must have been remarkable for their grace and beauty; but they were now of a livid hue, and swollen and distorted by pain. Still Leonard recognised them.

"Gracious heaven!" he exclaimed. "It is Sir Paul Parravicin."

"Sir Paul Parravicin!" echoed Chowles. "By all that's wonderful, so it is. Here is a circumstance which may be turned to good account. Bring the dead cart hither, Jonas,—quick—quick! I shall put him under the care of Judith Malmayns."

And the burier hurried off as fast as his legs could carry him.

"Had I known who it was," exclaimed Leonard, gazing with abhorrence at the miserable object before him, "I would have left him to die the death he so richly merits."

A deep groan broke from the sufferer.

"Have no fear, Sir Paul," said Chowles. "You are in good hands. Every care shall be taken of you, and you shall be nursed by Judith Malmayns."

"She shall not come near me," rejoined Parravicin, faintly. "You will take care of me?" he added, in an imploring tone to Leonard.

"You appeal in vain to me," rejoined the apprentice, sternly. "You are justly requited for your persecution of Nizza Macascree."

"I am—I am," groaned Parravicin, "but she will be speedily avenged. I shall soon join her in that pit."

"She is not there," replied Leonard, bitterly. "She is fast recovering from the plague."

"Is she not dead?" demanded Parravicin, with frightful eagerness. "I was told she was thrown into that horrible chasm."

"You were deceived," replied Leonard. "She was taken to the pest-house by your orders, and might have perished if she had not found a friend to aid her. She is now out of danger."

"Then I no longer desire to die," cried Parravicin, desperately. "I will live—live."

"Do not delude yourself," replied Leonard, sternly, "you have little chance of recovery, and should employ the short time left you in praying to Heaven for forgiveness of your sins."

"Tush!" exclaimed Parravicin, fiercely. "I shall not weary Heaven with ineffectual prayers. No," he added, with a frightful imprecation, "since Nizza is alive, I will not die."

"Right, Sir Paul, right," rejoined Chowles, "put a bold face on it, and I will answer for it you will get over the attack. Have no fear of Judith Malmayns," he added, in a significant tone. "However she may treat others, she will cure you."

"I will make it worth her while to do so," rejoined Parravicin.

"Here is the cart," cried Chowles, seeing the vehicle approach. "I will take you in the first place to Saint Paul's, and then to your own residence. Judith must see you as soon as possible."

"Take me where you please," rejoined Parravicin, faintly, "and remember what I have said. If I die, the nurse will get nothing;—if I am cured, she will be proportionately rewarded."

"I will not forget it," replied Chowles, and with the help of Jonas he placed the Knight carefully in the cart. "You need not trouble yourself further about him," he added, to Leonard.

"Before he quits this place, I must know who he is," rejoined the latter, placing himself at the horse's head.

"You know his name as well as I do," replied Chowles.

"Parravicin is not his real name," rejoined Leonard.

"Indeed!" exclaimed Chowles, "this is news to me. But no matter who he is—he is rich enough to pay well. So, stand aside, and let us go. We have no time to waste in further parleying."

"I will not move till my question is answered," replied Leonard, sturdily.

"We will see that," said Jonas, approaching him behind, and dealing him a blow on the head that stretched him senseless on the ground. "Shall we throw him into the pit?" he added, to Chowles.

The latter hesitated for a moment, and then said, "No, no, it is not worth while. We have no time to lose." And they then put the cart in motion and took the way to Saint Paul's.

On coming to himself, Leonard had some difficulty in recalling what had happened; and when the whole train of circumstances rushed upon his mind, he congratulated himself that he had escaped further injury. "When I think of the hands I have been placed in," he said, "I cannot but be grateful that they did not throw me into the pit, where no discovery could have been made as to how I came to an end. But I will not rest till I have ascertained the name and rank of Nizza's persecutor. I have no doubt they have taken him to Saint Paul's, and will proceed thither at once."

With this view, he hastened towards the nearest city gate, and passing through it, shaped his course towards the cathedral. It was a fine starlight night, and though there was no moon, the myriad lustres glowing in the deep and cloudless vault, rendered every object plainly distinguishable. At this hour, little restraint was placed upon the sick, and they wandered about the streets uttering dismal cries. Some would stretch themselves upon bulks or steps, where they were not unfrequently found bereft of life. Most of those not attacked by the distemper kept within their houses, but there were some few reckless beings who passed the night in the wildest revelry, braving the fate that awaited them. As Leonard passed Saint Michael's church in Basinghall-street, he perceived to his great surprise, that it was lighted up, and at first supposed service was going on, but on approaching, he heard strains of lively music proceeding from within. Pushing open the door, he entered the sacred edifice, and found it occupied by a party of twenty young men, accompanied by a like number of females, some of whom were playing at dice and cards, some drinking, others singing Bacchanalian melodies, others dancing along the aisles to the notes of a theorbo and spinnet. Leonard was so inexpressibly shocked by what he beheld, that, unable to contain himself, he mounted the steps of the pulpit, and called to the assemblage, in a loud voice, to desist from their scandalous conduct, and no longer profane the House of God. But they treated his remonstrances with laughter and derision, and some of the party, forming themselves in a group round the pulpit, entreated him to preach to them.

"We want a little variety," said one of the group, a good-looking young man, upon whom the wine had evidently made some impression,—"we are tired of drinking and play, and may as well listen to a sermon. Hold forth to us, I say."

"I would hold forth till daybreak, if I thought it would produce any impression," returned Leonard. "But I perceive you are too hardened to be aroused to repentance."

"Repentance!" cried another of the assemblage. "Do you know whom you address? We are called the Brotherhood of Saint Michael, and I am the principal. We are determined to enjoy the few days or hours we may have left—that is all. We are not afraid of the future, and are resolved to make the most of the present."

"Ay, ay," cried the others, with a great shout of laughter, which, however, was interrupted by a cry of anguish from one of the party.

"There is another person seized," said the principal; "take him away, brothers. This is owing to our listening to a sermon. Let us return to our wine."

"Will you not accept this awful warning?" cried Leonard. "You will all share your companion's fate."

"We anticipate nothing else," returned the principal, "and are, therefore, determined to banish reflection. A week ago, the Brotherhood of Saint Michael consisted of forty persons. We are already diminished to half the number, but are not the less merry on that account. On the contrary, we are more jovial than ever. We have agreed that whoever shall be seized with the distemper, shall be instantly conveyed to the pest-house, so that the hilarity of the others shall not be interrupted. The poor fellow who has just been attacked has left behind him a beautiful mistress. She is yours, if you choose to join us."

"Ay, stop with us," cried a young and very pretty woman, taking his hand, and drawing him towards the company who were dancing beneath the aisles.

But Leonard disengaged himself, and hurried away, amid the laughter and jeers of the assemblage. The streets, despite their desolate appearance, were preferable to the spot he had just quitted, and he seemed to breathe more freely when he got to a little distance from the polluted church.

He had now entered Wood-street, but all was still as death, and he paused to gaze up at his master's window; but there was no one at it. Many a lover, unable to behold the object of his affections, has in some measure satisfied the yearning of his heart by gazing at her dwelling; and such would have been Leonard's feeling if he had not been depressed by the idea of Amabel's illness. While thus wrapt in mournful thought, he observed three figures slowly approaching from the further end of the street, and he instinctively withdrew into a doorway. He had reason to congratulate himself on the precaution, for when the party drew nearer, he recognised, with a thrill of jealous hatred, the voice of Rochester. A moment's observation from his place of concealment showed him that the Earl was accompanied by Sir George Etherege and Pillichody. They paused within a short distance of him, and he could distinctly overhear their conversation.

"You have not yet told us why you have brought us here, my lord," said Etherege to Rochester, after the latter had gazed a few moments in silence at the house. "Are you resolved to make another attempt to carry off the girl—and failing in it, to give her up for ever?"

"You have guessed my purpose precisely," returned Rochester. "Doctor Hodges has informed a friend of mine that Amabel has fallen into a decline. She is, doubtless, pining for me, and it would be the height of inhumanity to let her perish."

Leonard ground his teeth with suppressed rage.

"Then you mean to make her Countess of Rochester after all," said Etherege. "I thought you had determined to carry off Mistress Mallet."

"Old Rowley declares he will send me to the Tower if I do," replied Rochester, "and though his threats have no great terror for me, I have no inclination for marriage at present. What a pity, Etherege, that one cannot, in these affairs, have the money oneself and give the wife to one's friend."

"That is easily managed," replied Etherege, laughing, "especially where you have a friend so devoted as myself. But do you mean to carry off Amabel to-night?"

"Ay, now we come to business," interposed Pillichody. "Bolts and barricades! your lordship has only to say the word, and I will break into the house, and bear her off for you."

"Your former conduct is a good guarantee for your present success, it must be owned," returned Rochester, contemptuously. "No, no; I shall postpone my design for the present. I have ascertained from the source whence I obtained information of Amabel's illness, that she is shortly to be removed into the country. This will exactly suit my purpose, and put her completely in my power."

"Then nothing is to be done to-night!" said Pillichody, secretly congratulating himself on his escape. "By my sword! I feel equal to the most desperate attempt."

"Your courage and dexterity must be reserved for some more favourable occasion," replied Rochester.

"If not to carry off the girl, I must again enquire why your lordship has come hither?" demanded Etherege.

"To be frank with you, my sole motive was to gaze at the house that contains her," replied Rochester, in a voice that bespoke his sincerity. "I have before told you that she has a strong hold upon my heart. I have not seen her for some weeks, and during that time have endeavoured to obliterate her image by making love to a dozen others. But it will not do. She still continues absolute mistress of my affections. I sometimes think, if I can obtain her in no other way I shall be rash enough to marry her."

"Pshaw! this must never be," said Etherege.

"Were I to lose her altogether, I should be inconsolable," cried Rochester.

"As inconsolable as I am for the rich widow of Watling-street, who died a fortnight ago of the plague," cried Pillichody, drawing forth a handkerchief, and applying it to his single orb—"oh! oh!"

"Silence, fool!" cried Rochester; "I am in no mood for buffoonery. If you shed tears for any one, it should be for your master."

"Truly, I am grieved for him," replied Pillichody; "but I object to the term 'master.' Sir Paul Parravicin, as he chose to be called, was my patron, not my master. A very close familiarity, not to say friendship, existed between us."

"Well, then, your patron," rejoined Rochester, scornfully. "How is he going on to-night?"

"I feared to tell your lordship," replied Pillichody, "lest it should spoil your mirth, but he broke out of his chamber a few hours ago, and has not been discovered since. Most likely, he will be found in the plague-pit or the Thames, for he was in such an infuriated state that it is the opinion of his attendants he would certainly destroy himself. You know he was attacked two days after Nizza Macas. cree was seized by the pestilence, and his brain has been running upon the poor girl ever since."

"Alas!" exclaimed Rochester, "it is a sad end, I am wearied of this infected city, and shall be heartily glad to quit it."

"Apropos of melancholy subjects," said Etherege—"the fair Stewart declares she cannot get that strange fellow who performed such fantastic tricks in the skeleton dance, in your masque, out of her head."

"You mean Chowles," replied the Earl. "He is a singular being, certainly—once a coffin-maker, and now, I believe, a burier of the dead. He takes up his abode in the crypt of Saint Faith's, and leads a most incomprehensible life. As we return, we shall pass the cathedral, and can see whether he is astir."

"Readily," replied Etherege. "Do you desire to tarry here longer, or shall we proceed before you, while you indulge your tender meditations?"

"Leave me," replied Rochester. "I shall be glad to be alone for a few moments."

Etherege and Pillichody then proceeded slowly towards Cheapside, while the Earl remained with his arms folded upon his breast, and his gaze fixed upon the house. Leonard watched him with intense curiosity, and had great difficulty in controlling himself. Though the Earl was armed, while he had only his staff, he could have easily mastered him by assailing him unawares. But Leonard's generous nature revolted at the unworthy suggestion, and he resolved, if he attacked him at all, to give him time to stand upon his guard. A moment's reflection, however, satisfied him that his wisest course would be to remain concealed. He was now in possession of the Earl's plan, and with the help of Doctor Hodges could easily defeat it; whereas, if he appeared, it would be evident he had overheard what had passed, and some other scheme, to which, he could not be privy, would be consequently adopted. Influenced by this consideration, he suffered the Earl to depart unmolested, and when he had got to some distance followed him.

Rochester's companions were waiting for him in Cheapside, and joining them, they all three proceeded towards the cathedral. They entered the great northern door, and Leonard, who was now well acquainted with all the approaches, passed through the door at the north side of the choir, to which he had been directed on a former occasion by Solomon Eagle.

He found the party guided by the old verger—the only one of its former keepers who still lingered about the place,—and preparing to descend to Saint Faith's. Leonard followed as near as he could without exposing himself, and on gaining the subterranean church easily contrived to screen himself behind the ponderous ranks of pillars.

By this time, they had reached the door of the charnel. It was closed, but Rochester knocked against it, and Chowles presently appeared. He seemed greatly surprised at seeing the Earl, nor was the latter less astonished when he learnt that Parravicin was within the vault. He desired to be shown to his friend and Chowles ushered him into the crypt. Leonard would have followed them, but as Pillichody and the old verger declined entering the charnel, and remained at the door, he could not do so.

Shortly after this, the sick man was brought out, stretched upon a pallet, borne by Chowles and Judith, and the party proceeded slowly, and occasionally relieving each other, to the great western entrance, where a coach being procured by Pillichody, Parravicin was placed within it with Judith and Chowles, and orders being given in an under tone to the driver, he departed. The others then proceeded towards Ludgate, while Leonard, disappointed in obtaining the information he sought, retraced his steps to Woodstreet.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

HOW SAINT PAUL'S WAS USED AS A PEST-HOUSE.

THE distemper had by this time increased to such a frightful extent, that the pest-houses being found wholly inadequate to contain the number of sick persons sent to them, it was resolved by the civic authorities, who had obtained the sanction of the Dean and Chapter of Saint Paul's for that purpose, no longer to delay converting the cathedral into a receptacle for the infected. Accordingly, a second meeting was held at the Convocation House to make final arrangements. It was attended by Sir John Lawrence, the Lord Mayor; by Sir George Waterman and Sir Charles Doe, Sheriffs; by Doctor Sheldon, Archbishop of Canterbury; by the Duke of Albemarle, the Earl of Craven, and a few other zealous and humane persons. Several members of the College of Physicians were likewise present, and amongst others Doctor Hodges; and the expediency of the measure being fully agreed upon, it was determined to carry it into immediate execution.

The meeting then adjourned to the cathedral. The cloisters surrounding the Convocation House were crowded with sick persons, drawn thither by the rumour of what was going forward; and these unfortunate beings likewise repaired to the sacred structure, and were with some difficulty kept aloof from the uninfected by the attendants. A very earnest and touching address was next pronounced by the archbishop. Calling upon his hearers to look on themselves as already dead to the world, to regard the present visitation as a just punishment of their sins, and to rejoice that their sufferings would be so soon terminated, when, if they sincerely and heartily repented, they would at once be transported from the depths of wretchedness and misery to regions of unfading bliss; he concluded by stating that he, and all those around him, were prepared to devote themselves, without regard to their own safety, to the preservation of their fellow-citizens, and that they would leave nothing undone to check the ravages of the devouring scourge.

It chanced that Leonard Holt was present on this occasion, and as he listened to the eloquent discourse of the good archbishop, and gazed at the group around him, all equally zealous in the good cause, and equally regardless of themselves, he could not but indulge a hope that their exertions might be crowned with success. It was, indeed, a touching sight to see the melancholy congregation to whom his address was delivered—many, nay, most of whom, were on the verge of dissolution, and whose ghastly countenances proclaimed the suffering they endured;—and Leonard Holt was so moved by the almost apostolic fervour of the prelate that, but for the thought of Amabel, he might have followed the example of several of the auditors, and devoted himself altogether to the service of the sick.

His discourse concluded, the archbishop and most of his companions quitted the cathedral. Hodges, however, and three of the physicians, remained behind to superintend the necessary preparations. Shortly after, a large number of pallets were brought in, and ranged along the nave and aisles at short distances from each other, and before night the interior of the structure presented the complete appearance of an hospital. Acting under the directions of Doctor Hodges, Leonard Holt lent his assistance in arranging the pallets, in covering them with bedding and blankets, and in executing any other service required of him. A sufficient number of surgeons and nurses were then sent for, and such was the expedition used that on that very night most of the pallets were occupied.

Thus the cathedral underwent another afflicting change. A blight had come over it, mildewing its holy walls, and tainting and polluting its altars. Its aisles, once trodden by grave and reverend ecclesiastics, and subsequently haunted by rufflers, bullies, and other worthless characters, were now filled with miserable wretches stricken with a loathsome and fatal disorder. Its chapels and shrines, once adorned with rich sculptures and costly ornaments, but stripped of them at times when they were looked upon as idolatrous and profane, were now occupied by nurses, surgeons, and attendants, while every niche and corner was filled with surgical implements, phials, drugs, poultices, foul rags and linen.

In less than a week after it had been converted into a pest-house, the cathedral was crowded to overflowing. Upwards of three hundred pallets were set up in the nave, in the aisles, in the transepts, and in the choir, and even in the chapels. But these proving insufficient, many poor wretches who were brought thither were placed on the cold flags, and protected only by a single blanket.

At night, the scene was really terrific. The imperfect light borne by the attendants fell on the couches, and revealed the livid countenances of their occupants, while the vaulted roof rang with shrieks and groans so horrible and heart-piercing as scarcely to be endured, except by those whose nerves were firmly strung, or had become blunted by their constant recurrence.

At such times, too, some unhappy creature, frenzied by agony, would burst from his couch, and running along the aisles, rend the air with cries, until overtaken and overpowered by his attendants. On one occasion it happened that a poor wretch, who had been thus caught, broke loose a second time, and darting through the door leading to the winding stone staircase in the northern transept, gained the ambulatory, and being closely followed, to escape his pursuers, sprang through one of the arched openings, and falling from a height of near sixty feet, was dashed in pieces on the flagged floor beneath.

A walk through this mighty lazaret-house would have afforded a wholesome lesson to the most reckless observer. It seemed to contain all the sick of the city. And yet it was not so. Hundreds were expiring in their own dwellings, and the other pest-houses continued crowded as before. Still, as a far greater number of the infected were here congregated, and could be seen at one view, the picture was incomparably more impressive. Every part of the cathedral was occupied. Those who could not find room inside it crouched beneath the columns of the portico on rugs or blankets, and implored the surgeons as they passed to attend to them. Want of room also drove others into Saint Faith's, and here the scene was, if possible, more hideous. In this dismal region it was found impossible to obtain a free circulation of air, and, consequently, the pestilential effluvia, unable to escape, acquired such malignancy that it was almost certain destruction to inhale it. After a time, few of the nurses and attendants would venture thither, and to take a patient to Saint Faith's was considered the same thing as consigning him to the grave.

Whether Judith Malmayns had succeeded or not in curing Sir Paul Parravicin, it is not our present purpose to inquire. Soon after the cathedral was converted into a lazaret-house, she returned thither, and, in spite of the opposition of Doctor Hodges, was appointed one of the nurses. It must not be supposed that her appointment was the result of any ill design. Such was the difficulty of obtaining attendance, that little choice was left, and the nurses being all of questionable character, it was supposed that she was only a shade worse than her fellows, while she was known to be active and courageous. And this was speedily proved, for when Saint Faith's was deserted by the others, she remained at her post, and quitted it neither night nor day. A large pit was dug in the open space at the north-east corner of the cathedral, and to this great numbers of bodies were nightly conveyed by Chowles and Jonas. But it was soon filled, and they were compelled to resort as before, to Finsbury-fields, and to another vast pit near Aldgate.

When not engaged in this revolting employment, Chowles took up his quarters in the crypt, where, in spite of his propinquity to the sick, he indulged himself in his customary revelry. He and Judith had amassed, in one way or other, a vast stock of spoil, and frequently planned how they would spend it when the pestilence ceased. Their treasure was carefully concealed in a cell, in one of the secret passages with which they were acquainted, leading from Saint Faith's to the upper structure.

One night, on his return from Finsbury-fields, as Chowles was seated in the crypt with a pipe in his mouth, and a half-finished flask of wine before him, he was startled by the sudden entrance of Judith, who, rushing up to him, seized him by the throat, and almost choked him before he could extricate himself.

"What is the matter—would you strangle me, you murderous haridan?" he cried.

"Ay, that I would," replied Judith, preparing to renew the attack.

"Stand off!" rejoined Chowles, springing nimbly back, and snatching up a spade, "or I will dash out your brains. Are you mad?" he continued, gazing fearfully at her.

"I am angry enough to make me so," she replied, shaking her clenched fists at him. "But I will be revenged—revenged I tell you."

"Revenged!" cried Chowles, in astonishment—"for what! What have I done?"

"You do well to affect ignorance," rejoined Judith, "but you cannot deceive me. No one but you can have done it."

"Done what!" exclaimed Chowles, in increasing astonishment. "Has our hoard been discovered?"

"Ay, and been carried off—by you—you," screamed Judith, with the look of a fury.

"By my soul you are wrong," cried Chowles. "I have never touched it,—never even approached the hiding-place except in your presence."

"Liar!" returned Judith, "the whole hoard is gone,—the plunder I obtained in Newgate,—the Earl of Rochester's plate,—all the rings, trinkets, and rich apparel I have picked up since,—everything is gone,—and who but you can be the robber?"

"It is difficult to say," rejoined Chowles. "But I swear to you you suspect me wrongfully."

"Restore it," replied Judith, "or tell me where it is hidden. If not, I will be the death of you."

"Let us go to the hiding-place," replied Chowles, whose uneasiness was not diminished by the menace. "You may be mistaken, and I hope you are."

Though he uttered the latter part of his speech with seeming confidence, his heart misgave him. To conceal his trepidation, he snatched up a lamp, and passing through the secret door, hurried along the narrow stone passage. He was about to open the cell, when he perceived near it the tall figure of the enthusiast.

"There is the robber!" he cried to Judith. "I have found him. It is Solomon Eagle. Villain! you have purloined our hoard!"

"I have done so," replied Solomon Eagle, "and I will carry off all other spoil you may obtain. Think not to hide it from me. I can watch you when you see me not, and track you when you suppose me afar off."

"Indeed!" exclaimed Chowles, trembling. "I begin to think he is possessed of supernatural power," he added, in an undertone to Judith.

"Go on," pursued Solomon Eagle, "continue to plunder and destroy—pursue your guilty career, and see what reward you will reap."

"Restore what you have robbed us of," cried Judith, in a menacing tone, "or dread the consequences."

"Woman, you threaten idly," returned Solomon Eagle. "Your ill-gotten treasure is gone—whither you will never know. Get hence!" he added, in a terrible tone, "or I will rid the earth of you both!"

So awed were they by his voice and gestures that they slunk away with a discomfited air, and returned to the crypt.

"If we are always to be robbed in this manner," observed Chowles, "we had better shift our quarters, and practise elsewhere."

"He shall not repeat the offence with impunity," returned Judith. "I will speedily get rid of him."

"Beware!" cried a voice, which they recognised as that of Solomon Eagle, though whence proceeding they could not precisely determine. The pair glanced at each other uneasily, but neither spoke a word.

Meanwhile, Leonard Holt did not omit to pay a daily visit to the cathedral. It was a painful contemplation, and yet not without deep interest, to witness the constant succession of patients, most of whom were swept away by the scourge in the course of a couple of days, or even in a shorter period. Out of every hundred persons attacked, five did not recover; and whether the virulence of the distemper increased, or the summer heats rendered its victims more easily assailable, certain it is they were carried off far more expeditiously than before. Doctor Hodges was unremitting in his attentions, but his zeal and anxiety availed nothing. He had to contend with a disease over which medicine exercised little control.

One morning, as he was about to enter the cathedral, he met Leonard beneath the portico, and as soon as the latter caught sight of him, he hurried towards him.

"I have been in search of you," he said, "and was about to proceed to your residence. Mr. Bloundel wishes to see you immediately. Amabel is worse."

"I will go with you at once," replied the Doctor.

And they took the way to Wood-street.

"From a few words let fall by my master, I imagine he intends sending Amabel into the country to-morrow," said Leonard, as they proceeded.

"I hope so," replied Hodges. "He has already delayed it too long. You will be glad to hear that Nizza Macascree is quite recovered. To-morrow, or the next day, she will be able to see you with safety."

"Heaven knows where I may be to-morrow," rejoined Leonard. "Wherever Amabel goes, I shall not be far off."

"Faithful to the last!" exclaimed Hodges. "Well, I shall not oppose you. We must take care that the Earl of Rochester does not get a hint of our proceedings. At this time, a chance meeting (were it nothing more,) might prove fatal to the object of our solicitude."

Leonard said nothing, but the colour fled his cheek, and his lip slightly quivered. In a few seconds more, they reached the grocer's house.

They found him at the window, anxiously expecting them; and Doctor Hodges being drawn up in the same way as before, was conducted to Amabel's chamber. She was reclining in an easy chair, with the Bible on her knee; and though her frame was much wasted away, she looked more lovely than ever. A slight hectic flush increased the brilliancy of her eyes, which had now acquired that ominous lustre peculiar to persons in a decline. There were other distressing symptoms in her appearance which the skilful physician well knew how to interpret. To an inexperienced eye, however, she would have appeared charming. Nothing could exceed the delicacy of her complexion, nor the lovely mould of her features, which, though they had lost much of their fullness and roundness, had gained in expression; while the pencilled brows clearly traced upon her snowy forehead, the long dark eyelashes shading her cheek, and the rich satin tresses drooping over her shoulders, completed her attractions.

Her mother stood by her side, and not far from her sat little Christiana, amusing herself with some childish toy, and ever and anon stealing an anxious glance at her sister. Taking Amabel's arm, and sighing to himself to think how thin it was, the Doctor placed his finger upon her pulse. Whatever might be his secret opinion, he thought fit to assume a hopeful manner, and looking smilingly at her, said, "You are better than I expected, but your departure to the country must not be deferred. These close rooms and long confinement are too much for you."

"Since it is my father's wish that I should go," replied Amabel, gently, "I am quite willing to comply,

But I feel it will be of no avail, and I would rather pass the rest of my life here than with strangers. I cannot be happier than I am now."

"Perhaps not," replied Hodges; "but a few weeks spent in some salubrious spot will remove all apprehensions as to your health. You will find your strength return, and with it the desire of life."

"My life is in the hands of my Maker," replied Amabel, "and I am ready to resign it when it shall be required of me. At the same time, however anxious I may be to quit a world which appears a blank to me, I would make every effort for the sake of those whose happiness is dearer to me than my own, to purchase a complete restoration to health. If my father desires me to try removal to the country, and you think it may have a beneficial effect, I am ready to go. But do not urge it, unless you think there is a chance of my recovery."

"I will tell you frankly," replied the Doctor, "if you remain here you have not many weeks to live."

"But if I go, will you promise me health?" rejoined Amabel. "Do not deceive me. Is there a hope?"

"Unquestionably," replied the Doctor. "Change of air will work wonders."

"I beseech you not to hesitate—for my sake do not, dearest daughter," said Mrs. Bloundel, with difficulty repressing tears.

"And for mine," added her father more firmly, yet with deep emotion.

"I have already expressed my readiness to accede to your wishes," replied Amabel. "Whenever you have made arrangements for me, I will set out."

"And now comes the question—where is she to go?" remarked Hodges.

"I have a sister who lives as housekeeper at Lord Craven's seat, Ashdown Park," replied Mr. Bloundel. "She shall go thither, and her aunt will take every care of her. The mansion is delightfully situated amid the Berkshire hills, and the air is the purest and best in England."

"Nothing can be better," replied Hodges; "but who is to escort her thither?"

"Leonard Holt," replied Mr. Bloundel. "He will gladly undertake the office."

"No doubt," rejoined Hodges; "but cannot you go yourself?"

"Impossible!" returned the grocer, a shade passing over his countenance.

"Neither do I wish it," observed Amabel. "I am content to be under the safe-guard of Leonard."

"Amabel," said her father, "you know not what I shall endure in thus parting with you. I would give all I possess to be able to accompany you, but a sense of duty restrains me. I have taken the resolution to remain here with my family during the continuance of the pestilence, and I must abide by it. I little thought how severely my constancy would be tried. But hard though it be I must submit. I shall commit you, therefore, to the care of an all-merciful Providence, who will not fail to watch over and protect you."

"Have no fear for me, father," replied Amabel; "and do not weep, dear mother," she added to Mrs. Bloundel, who, unable to restrain her grief, was now drowned in tears; "I shall be well cared for. If we meet no more in this world, our re-union is certain in that to come. I have given you much pain and uneasiness, but it will be an additional grief to me if I think that you feel further anxiety on my account."

"We do not, my dear child," replied Mr. Bloundel. "I am well assured all is for the best, and if it pleases Heaven to spare you, I shall rejoice beyond measure in your return: if not, I shall feel a firm reliance that you will continue in the same happy frame that you now are to the last, and that we shall meet above, where there will be no further separation."

"I cannot bear to part with her," cried Mrs. Bloundel, clasping her arms round her daughter—"I cannot—I cannot!"

"Restrain yourself, Honora," said her husband; "you will do her an injury."

"She must not be over-excited," interposed Hodges, in a low tone, and gently drawing the afflicted mother away. "The sooner," he added to Mr. Bloundel, "she now sets out the better."

"I feel it," replied the grocer. "She shall start to-morrow morning."

"I will undertake to procure horses," replied Hodges. "and Leonard will be ready at any moment."

With this, he took his leave, and descending by the pulley, told Leonard what had occurred.

In spite of his fears on her account, the prospect of again beholding Amabel so transported the apprentice that he could scarcely attend to what was said respecting her. When he grew calmer, it was arranged that all should be in readiness at an early hour on the following morning—that a couple of horses should be provided, and that Amabel should be let down fully equipped for the journey. This settled, Leonard, at the Doctor's request, accompanied him to his residence.

They were scarcely out of sight, when a man, who had been concealed behind the hutch in such a position that not a word that had passed escaped him, issued from his hiding-place, and darting down the first alley on the right, made the best of his way to Whitehall.

CHAPTER XXIX.

THE RING.

UP to this time, Doctor Hodges had not judged it prudent to allow a meeting between Leonard and Nizza Macascree, but now, from reasons of his own, he resolved no longer to delay it. Accordingly, on reaching his dwelling, he took the apprentice to her chamber. Nizza was standing in a pensive attitude near a window which looked towards the river, and as she turned on his entrance, Leonard perceived that her eyes were filled with tears. Blushing deeply, she advanced towards him, and greeted him with all the warmth of her affectionate nature. She had quite recovered her good looks, and Leonard could not but admit that, had he seen her before his heart was pledged to another, it must have been given to her. Comparisons are ungracious, and tastes differ more perhaps as to beauty than on any other point, but if Amabel and the piper's daughter had been placed together it would not have been difficult to determine to which of the two the palm of superior loveliness should be assigned. There was a witchery in the magnificent black eyes of the latter—in her exquisitely-formed mouth and pearly teeth—in her clear, nut-brown complexion—in her dusky and luxuriant tresses, and in her light elastic figure, with which more perfect but less piquant charms could not compete.

Such seemed to be the opinion of Doctor Hodges, for as he gazed at her with unaffected admiration, he exclaimed, as if to himself—"I faith, if I had to choose between the two, I know which I would take."

This exclamation somewhat disconcerted the parties to whom it referred, and the Doctor did not relieve their embarrassment by adding, "Well, I perceive I am in the way. You must have much to say to each other that can in nowise interest me. Excuse me a moment while I see that the horses are ordered."

So saying, and disregarding Leonard's expostulating looks, he hurried out of the room, and shut the door after him.

Hitherto the conversation had been unrestrained and agreeable on both sides, but now they were left alone together neither appeared able to utter a word. Nizza cast her eyes timidly on the ground, while Leonard caressed little Bell, who had been vainly endeavouring by her gamesome tricks to win his attention.

"Doctor Hodges spoke of ordering horses," said

Nizza, at length, breaking silence. "Are you going a journey?"

"I am about to take Amabel to Ashdown Park, in Berkshire, to-morrow morning," replied Leonard. "She is dangerously ill."

"Of the plague?" asked Nizza, anxiously.

"Of a yet worse disorder," replied Leonard, heaving a deep sigh—"of a broken heart."

"Alas! I pity her from my soul!" replied Nizza, in a tone of the deepest commiseration. "Does her mother go with her?"

"No," replied Leonard, "I alone shall attend her. She will be placed under the care of a near female relative at Ashdown."

"Would it not be better,—would it not be safer, if she is in the precarious state you describe, that some one of her own sex should accompany her?" said Nizza.

"I should greatly prefer it," rejoined Leonard; "and so I am sure would Amabel. But where is such a person to be found?"

"I will go with you if you desire it," replied Nizza; "and will watch over her, and tend her as a sister."

"Are you equal to the journey?" replied Leonard, somewhat doubtfully.

"Fully," replied Nizza. "I am entirely recovered, and able to undergo far more fatigue than an invalid like Amabel."

"It will relieve me from a world of anxiety if this can be accomplished," rejoined Leonard. "I will consult Doctor Hodges on the subject on his return."

"What do you desire to consult me about?" cried the physician, who had entered the room unobserved at this juncture.

The apprentice stated Nizza's proposal to him.

"I entirely approve of the plan," observed the Doctor—"it will obviate many difficulties. I have just received a message from Mr. Bloundel by Dallison the porter, to say that he intends sending Blaize with you. I will, therefore, give directions that the horses shall be provided with pillions, so that the whole party can be accommodated."

He then sat down, and wrote out minute instructions for Amabel's treatment, and delivering the paper to Leonard, desired him to give it to the housekeeper at Ashdown Park.

"Heaven only knows what the result of all this will be!" he exclaimed. "But nothing must be neglected."

Leonard promised that his directions should be scrupulously followed, and the discourse then turning upon Nizza's father, she expressed the utmost anxiety to see him before she started.

Hodges readily assented.

"Your father has been discharged as cured from the pesthouse," he said, "and is lodged at a cottage, kept by my old nurse, Dame Lucas, just without the walls, on the right, near Moorgate. I will send for him."

"On no account," replied Nizza. "I will go to him myself."

"As you please," returned Hodges. "Leonard shall accompany you. You will easily find the cottage. It is about two hundred yards beyond the gate on the right, near the old dog-houses."

"I know the spot perfectly," rejoined Leonard.

"I would recommend you to put on a mask," observed the Doctor to Nizza; "it may protect you from molestation. I will find you one below."

Leading the way to a lower room, he opened a drawer, and producing a small lloo mask, gave it to her. The youthful pair then quitted the house,—Nizza, taking Bell under her arm, as she intended leaving her with her father. The necessity of the Doctor's caution was speedily manifested, for as they crossed Saint Paul's Churchyard they encountered Pillichody, who, glancing inquisitively at Nizza, seemed disposed to push his inquiries further, but the fierce look of the apprentice, who grasped his staff in a menacing manner, induced him to abandon his purpose. He however, followed them along Cheapside, and would have pursued them through the Old Jewry, if Leonard had not come to a halt, and awaited his approach. He then took to his heels, and did not again make his appearance.

As they reached the open fields, and slackened their pace, Leonard deemed it prudent to prepare his companion for her interview with her father, by mentioning to her the circumstance of the packet, and the important secret which he had stated he had to disclose to her.

"I cannot tell what the secret can relate to, unless it is to my mother," rejoined Nizza. "She died, I believe, when I was an infant. At all events, I never remember seeing her, and I have remarked that my father is averse to talking about her. But I will now question him. I have reason to think this piece of gold," and she produced the amulet, "is in some way or other connected with the mystery."

And she then explained to Leonard all that had occurred in the vault when the coin had been shown to Judith Malmayns, describing the nurse's singular look, and her father's subsequent anger.

By this time, they had entered a narrow footpath, leading across the fields in the direction of a little nest of cottages, and pursuing it, they came to a garden gate. Opening it, they beheld the piper seated beneath a little porch, covered with eglantine and roses. He was playing a few notes on his pipe, but stopped on hearing their approach. Bell who had been put to the ground by Nizza, ran barking gleefully towards him. Uttering a joyful exclamation, the piper stretched out his arms, and the next moment enfolded his daughter in a strict embrace. Leonard remained at the gate till the first transports of their meeting were over, and then advanced slowly towards them.

"Whose footsteps are those?" inquired the piper.

Nizza explained.

"Ah, is it Leonard Holt!" exclaimed the piper, extending his hand to the apprentice. "You are heartily welcome," he added, "and I am glad to find you with Nizza. It is no secret to me that she likes you. She has been an excellent daughter, and will make an excellent wife. He who weds her will obtain a greater treasure than he expects."

"Not than he expects," said Leonard.

"Ay, than he expects," reiterated the piper. "You will find out some day or other that I speak the truth."

Leonard looked at Nizza, who was blushing deeply at her father's remark. She understood him.

"Father," she said, "I understand you have a secret of importance to disclose to me. I am about to make a long journey to-morrow, and may not return for some time. At this uncertain season, when those who part know not that they shall meet again, nothing of this sort ought to be withheld."

"You cannot know it while I live," replied the piper, "but I will take such precautions that, if anything happens to me, it shall be certainly revealed to you."

"I am satisfied," she rejoined, "and will only ask you one further question, which I beseech you to answer. Does this amulet refer to the secret?"

"It does," replied her father sullenly. "And now let the subject be dropped."

He then led the way into the cottage. The good old dame, who kept it, on learning who they were, and that they were sent by Doctor Hodges, gave them a hearty welcome, and placed some refreshments before them. Leonard commented upon the extreme neatness of the abode and its healthful situation, and expressed a hope that it might not be visited by the plague.

"I trust it will not," rejoined the old woman, shaking her head; "but when I hear the doleful bell at night,—when I catch a glimpse of the fatal cart, or look towards yon dreadful place,"—and she pointed in the direction of the plague-pit, which lay only a few hundred yards to the west of her habitation,—"I am reminded that the scourge is not far off, and that it must reach me ere long."

"Have no fear, Dame Lucas," said the piper; "you see it has pleased a merciful Providence to spare the lives of myself, my child, and this young man. And if you should be attacked, the same beneficent being may preserve you in like manner."

"I hope so," returned Dame Lucas, "but the Lord's will be done! I know I shall be well attended to by Doctor Hodges. I nursed him when he was an infant, and he has been like a son to me. Bless his kind heart!" she exclaimed, her eyes filling with tears of gratitude, "there is not his like in London."

"Always excepting my master," observed Leonard, with a smile at her enthusiasm.

"I except no one," rejoined Dame Lucas. "A worthier man never lived. If I die of the plague," she continued, "he has promised not to let me be thrown into that horrible pit,—ough!—but to bury me in my garden, beneath the old apple-tree."

"And he will keep his word, dame, I am sure," replied Leonard. "I would recommend you, however, as the best antidote against the plague, to keep yourself constantly employed, and to indulge as few gloomy notions as possible."

"I am seldom melancholy, and still more seldom idle," replied the good dame. "But despondency will steal on me sometimes, especially when the dead-cart passes, and I think what it contains."

While this conversation was going forward, Nizza and the piper withdrew into an inner room, where they remained closeted together for some time. On their re-appearance, Nizza said she was ready to depart; and, taking an affectionate farewell of her father, and committing Bell to his charge, she quitted the cottage with the apprentice.

Evening was now advancing, and the sun was setting in all the gorgeousness already described as peculiar to this fatal period. Filled with the pleasing melancholy inspired by the hour, they walked on in silence. They had not proceeded far, when they observed a man crossing the field with a bundle in his arms. Suddenly, he staggered and fell. Seeing he did not stir, and guessing what was the matter, Leonard ran towards him to offer him assistance. He found him lying in the grass with his left hand fixed against his heart. He groaned heavily, and his features were convulsed with pain. Near him lay the body of a beautiful little girl, with long fair hair, and finely formed features, though now disfigured by purple blotches, proclaiming the disorder of which she had perished. She was apparently about ten years old, and was partially covered by a linen cloth. The man, whose features bore a marked resemblance to those of the child, was evidently from his attire above the middle rank. His frame was remarkably athletic, and as he was scarcely past the prime of life, the irresistible power of the disease, which could, in one moment, prostrate strength like his, was terribly attested.

"Alas!" he cried, addressing the apprentice, "I was about to convey the remains of my poor child to the plague pit. But I have been unable to accomplish my purpose. I hoped she would have escaped the contamination of those loathly attendants on the dead-cart."

"She shall escape it," replied Leonard. "If you wish it, I will carry her to the pit myself."

"The blessing of a dying man rest on your head," cried the sufferer. "Your charitable action will not pass unrequited."

With this, despite the agony he endured, he dragged himself to his child, kissed her cold lips, smoothed her fair tresses, and covered the body carefully with the cloth. He then delivered it to Leonard, who received it tenderly, and calling to Nizza Macascree, who had witnessed the scene at a little distance, and was deeply affected by it, to wait his return, ran towards the plague pit. Arrived there, he placed his little burthen at the brink of the excavation, and kneeling beside it, uttered a short prayer prompted by the occasion. He then tore his handkerchief into strips, and tying them together, lowered the body gently down. It sunk into the putrid mass, and throwing a little earth over it, he departed. Hastening to the sick man, he told him what he had done. A smile of satisfaction illumined the sufferer's countenance, and holding out his hand, on which a valuable ring glistened, he said "Take it, it is but a poor reward for the service you have rendered me—nay, take it," he added, seeing that the apprentice hesitated, "others will not be so scrupulous."

Unable to gainsay this remark, Leonard took the ring from his finger, and placed it on his own. At that moment, the sick man's gaze fell upon Nizza, who stood at a little distance from him. He started, and made an effort to clear his vision.

"Do my eyes deceive me?" he cried; "or is a female standing there?"

"You are not deceived," replied Leonard.

"Let her come near me, in heaven's name!" cried the sick man, staring at her as if his eyes would start from their sockets. "Who are you?" he continued, as Nizza approached.

"I am called Nizza Macascree, and am the daughter of a poor piper," she replied.

"Ah!" exclaimed the sick man, with a look of deep disappointment. "The resemblance is wonderful! And yet it cannot be. My brain is bewildered."

"Whom does she resemble?" asked Leonard, eagerly.

"One very dear to me," replied the sick man, with an expression of remorse and anguish, "one I would not think of now." And he buried his face in the grass.

"Is there aught more I can do for you?" inquired Leonard, after a pause.

"No," replied the sick man; "I have done with the world. With that child the last tie that bound me to it was snapped."

"Do not give way thus," replied Leonard; "a short time ago my condition was as apparently hopeless as your own, and you see I am now perfectly recovered."

"You had something to live for—something to love," groaned the sick man. "All I lived for, all I loved, are gone."

"Be comforted, sir," said Nizza, in a commiserating tone. "Much happiness may yet be in store for you."

"That voice!" exclaimed the sick man, with a look that denoted the approach of delirium, "it must be my Isabella. Oh! forgive me! sweet injured saint, forgive me!"

"Your presence evidently distresses him," said Leonard. "Let us hasten for assistance. Your name, sir?" he added, to the sick man.

"Why should you seek to know it?" replied the other. "No tombstone will be placed over the plague-pit."

"Not a moment must be lost if you would save him," cried Nizza.

"You are right," replied Leonard. "Let us fly to the nearest apothecary's."

Accordingly, they set off at a quick pace towards Moorgate. Just as they reached it, they heard the bell ring, and saw the dead-cart approaching. Shrinking back while it passed, they ran on till they came to an apothecary's shop, where Leonard, describing the state of the sick man, by his entreaties, induced the master of the establishment and one of his assistants to accompany him. Leaving Nizza in the shop, he then retraced his steps with his companions. The sick man was lying where he had left him, but perfectly insensible. On searching his pockets, a purse of money was found, but neither letter nor tablet to tell who he was. Leonard offered the purse to the apothecary, but the latter declined it, and desired his assistant, who had brought a barrow with him, to place the sick man within it, and convey him to the pest-house.

"He will be better cared for there, than if I were to take charge of him," he observed. "As to the money, you can return it if he recovers. If not, it belongs of right to you."

Seeing that remonstrance would be useless, Leonard did not attempt it, and while the assistant wheeled away the sick man, he returned with the apothecary to his dwelling. Thanking him for his kindness, he then hastened with Nizza Macasree to Great Knight-riding-street. He related to the Doctor all that had occurred, and showed him the ring. Hodges listened to the recital with great attention, and at its close said, "This is a very singular affair, and excites my curiosity greatly. I will go to the pest-house and see the sick man to-morrow. And now we will proceed to supper, and then you had better retire to rest, for you will have to be astir before day-break. All is in readiness for the journey."

The last night (for such she considered it) spent by Amabel in her father's dwelling, was passed in the kindest interchanges of affection. Mr. Bloundel had much ado to maintain his firmness, and ever anon, in spite of his efforts, his labouring bosom and faltering tones proclaimed the struggle within. He sat beside his daughter, with her thin fingers clasped in his, and spoke hertofore every consolatory topic that suggested itself. Their discourse, however, insensibly took a serious turn, and the grocer became fully convinced that his daughter was not merely reconciled to the early death that appeared to await her, but wishful for it. He found too, to his inexpressible grief, that the sense of the Earl of Rochester's treachery, combined with her own indiscretion, and the consequences that might have ensued, had sunk deep into her heart, and produced the present sad result.

Mrs. Bloundel, it will scarcely be supposed, could support herself so well as her husband, but when any paroxysm of grief approached, she rushed out of the room, and gave vent to her affliction alone. All the rest of the family were present, and were equally distressed. But what most strongly affected Amabel was a simple, natural remark of little Christiana, who, fixing her tearful gaze on her, entreated her to "come back soon."

Weak as she was, Amabel took the child upon her knee, and said to her, "I am going a long journey, Christiana, and, perhaps, may never come back. But if you attend to what your father says to you—if you never omit, morning and evening, to implore the blessing of heaven, we shall meet again."

"I understand what you mean, sister," said Christiana. "The place you are going to is the grave."

"You have guessed rightly, Christiana," rejoined Amabel, solemnly. "Do not forget my last words to you, and when you are grown into a woman, think upon the poor sister who loved you tenderly."

"I shall always think of you," said Christiana, clasping her arms round the other's neck. "Oh! I wish I could go to the grave instead of you."

Amabel pressed her to her bosom, and in a broken voice murmured a blessing over her.

Mr. Bloundel here thought it necessary to interfere, and taking the weeping child in his arms, carried her into the adjoining apartment.

Soon after this, the household were summoned to prayers, and as the grocer poured forth his supplications to heaven for his daughter's recovery, all fervently repeated his words. Their devotions ended, Amabel took leave of her brothers, and the parting might have been painfully prolonged, but for the interposition of her father. The last and severest trial was at hand. She had now to part from her mother—from whom, except on the occasion of her flight with the Earl of Rochester—she had never yet been separated. She had now to part with her, in all probability, for ever. It was a heart-breaking reflection to both. Knowing it would only renew their afflic-tion, and perhaps unfit Amabel for the journey, Mr. Bloundel had prevailed upon his wife to part with her at night, and not to see her in the morning. The moment had, therefore, arrived for their separation. The anguish displayed in his wife's countenance was too much for the grocer, and he covered his face with his hands. He heard her approach Amabel—he listened to their mutual sobs—to their last embrace! It was succeeded by a stifled cry, and uncovering his face at the sound, he sprang to his feet just in time to receive his swooning wife in his arms.

CHAPTER XXX.

THE DEPARTURE.

IT struck four by Saint Paul's as Doctor Hodges, accompanied by Leonard and Nizza Macascree, issued from his dwelling, and proceeded towards Wood-street. The party was followed by a man leading a couple of horses, equipped with pillions, and furnished with saddle-bags, partly filled with the scanty luggage which the apprentice and the piper's daughter took with them. A slight haze, indicative of the intense heat that was to follow, hung round the lower part of the cathedral, but its upper pinnacles glittered in the beams of the newly-risen sun. As Leonard gazed at the central tower, he descried Solomon Eagle on its summit, and pointed out the figure to Hodges. Motioning the apprentice, in a manner that could not be misunderstood, to stop, the enthusiast vanished, and in another moment appeared upon the roof, and descended to the battlements overlooking the spot where Leonard stood. This was at the north-west corner of the cathedral, at a short distance from the portico. The enthusiast had a small sack in his hand, and calling to Nizza Macascree to take it, flung it to the ground. The sound it made in its fall proved that it contained gold or silver, while its size showed that the amount must be considerable. Nizza looked at the sack in astonishment, but did not offer to touch it.

"Take it!" thundered Solomon Eagle, "it is your dowry." And perceiving she hesitated to comply with the injunction, he shouted to Leonard,—“Give it her. I have no use for gold. May it make you and her happy!”

"I know not where he can have obtained this money," observed Hodges; "but I am sure in no unlawful manner, and I, therefore, counsel Nizza to accept his boon. It may be of the greatest use to her at some future time."

His scruples being thus overcome, Leonard took the sack and placed it in one of the saddle-bags.

"You can examine it at your leisure," remarked Hodges to Nizza. "We have no more time to lose."

Solomon Eagle, meanwhile, expressed his satisfaction at the apprentice's compliance by his gestures, and whirling his staff round his head, pointed towards the west of the city, as if inquiring whether that was the route they meant to take. Leonard nodded an affirmative; and the enthusiast spreading out his arms, and pronouncing an audible benediction over them, they resumed their course. The streets were silent and deserted, except by the watchmen stationed at the doors of the infected dwellings, and a few sick persons lying on the steps of some of the better habitations. In order to avoid coming in contact with these miserable creatures, the party, with the exception of Doctor Hodges, kept in the middle of the road. Attracted by the piteous exclamations of the sufferers, the humane physician, ever and anon, paused to speak to them; and he promised one poor woman, who was suckling an infant, to visit her as he returned that way.

"I have little hopes of saving her," he observed to Leonard, "but I may preserve her child. There is an establishment in Aldgate for infants whose mothers have died of the plague, where more than a hundred little creatures are suckled by she-goats, and it is wonderful how well they thrive under their nurses. If I can induce this poor woman to part with her babe, I will send it thither."

Just then, their attention was arrested by the sudden opening of a casement, and a middle-aged woman, wringing her hands, cried out, with a look of unutterable anguish and despair, "Pray for us, good people, pray for us!"

"We do pray for you, my poor soul!" rejoined Hodges, "as well as for a'l who are similarly afflicted. What sick have you within?"

"There were ten yesterday," replied the woman. "Two have died in the night—my husband and my eldest son, and there are eight others whose recovery is hopeless. Pray for us,—as you hope to be spared yourselves, pray for us!" And, with a lamentable cry, she closed the casement.

Familiarised as all who heard her were with spectacles of horror and tales of woe, they could not listen to the poor woman's sad recital, nor look upon her distracted countenance, without the deepest sympathy. Other sights had previously affected them, but not in the same degree. Around the little conduit then standing in front of the Old 'Change, at the western extremity of Cheapside, were two lazars laving their sores in the water; while in the short space between this spot and Wood-street, Leonard counted upwards of twenty doors marked with the fatal red cross, and bearing the doleful inscription, "Lord have mercy upon us!"

A few minutes' walking brought them to the grocer's habitation, and on reaching it, they found that Blaize had already descended. He was scarcely able to contain himself for joy at his restoration to freedom.

"Miss Amabel will make her appearance in a few minutes," he said to Leonard. "Our master is with her, and is getting all ready for her departure. I have not come unprovided with medicine," he added, to Doctor Hodges. "I have got a bottle of plague-water in one pocket and a phial of vinegar in the other. Besides these, I have a small pot of May-erne's electuary in my bag, another of the grand antipestilential confection, and a third of the infallible antidote which I bought of the celebrated physician, Doctor Constantine Rhodocanaceis, at his shop near the Three Kings Inn, in Southampton-buildings. I dare say you have heard of him?"

"I have, indeed," replied Hodges. "His end was a just retribution for the tricks he practised on his dupes. In spite of his infallible antidote, he fell a victim to the scourge. But what else have you got?"

"Only a few trifles," replied Blaize, with a chop-fallen look. "Patience has made me a pomander-ball composed of angelica, rue, zedoary, camphor, wax, and laudanum, which I have hung round my neck with a string. Then I have got a good sized box of rufuses, and have swallowed three of them preparatory to the journey."

"A proper precaution," observed Hodges, with a smile.

"This is not all," replied Blaize. "By my mother's advice, I have eaten twenty leaves of rue, two roasted figs, and a couple of pickled walnuts for breakfast, washing the mess down with an ale posset with pim-pernel seethed in it."

"Indeed!" exclaimed Hodges. "You must be in a pretty condition for a journey. But how could you bear to part with your mother and Patience?"

"The separation from Patience was heart-breaking," replied Blaize, taking out his handkerchief, and applying it to his eyes. "We sat up half the night together, and I felt so much overcome that I began to waver in my resolution of departing. I am glad I did not give way to the weakness of my nature," he added in a more sprightly tone. "Fresh air and bright sunshine are very different things from the close rooms in that dark house."

"You must not forget that you were there free from contagion," rejoined Hodges, "while here you are exposed to its assaults."

"True," replied Blaize; "that makes a vast difference. I almost wish I was back again."

"It is too late to think of returning now," said Hodges. "Mount your horse, and I will assist Nizza into the pillion."

By the time that Blaize, who was but an indifferent horseman, had got into the saddle, and Nizza had taken her place behind him, the window opened, and Mr. Bloundel appeared at it.

Amabel had only retired to rest for a few hours during the night. When left to herself in her chamber, she continued to pray till exhaustion compelled her to seek some repose. Arising about two o'clock, she employed more than an hour in further devotion, and then took a last survey of every object in the room. She had occupied it from childhood, and as she opened drawer after drawer, and cupboard after cupboard, and examined their contents, each article recalled some circumstance connected with the past, and brought back a train of long-forgotten emotions.

While she was thus engaged, Patience tapped at the door, and was instantly admitted. The tender-hearted kitchen-maid assisted her to dress, and to put together some few articles omitted to be packed up by her mother. During this employment, she shed abundance of tears, and Amabel's efforts to console her only made matters worse. Poor Patience was forced, at last, to sit down and indulge what she called "a hearty fit of crying," after which she felt considerably relieved. As soon as she was sufficiently recovered to be able to speak, she observed to Amabel—"Pardon what I am about to say, my dear young mistress, but I cannot help thinking that the real seat of your disease is the heart."

A slight blush overspread Amabel's pale features, but she made no answer.

"I see I am right," continued Patience, "and indeed I have long suspected it. Let me entreat you, therefore, dear young lady, not to sacrifice yourself. Only say the word, and I will find means of making your retreat known to the Earl of Rochester. Blaize is devoted to you, and will do anything you bid him. I cannot wonder you fret so after so handsome, so captivating a man as the Earl,—especially when you are worried to death to marry a common apprentice like Leonard Holt, who is not worthy to hold a candle to your noble admirer. Ah! we women can never blind ourselves to the advantages of rank and appearance. We are too good judges for that. I hope you will soon be restored to your lover, and that the happiness you will enjoy will make amends for all the misery you have endured."

"Patience," said Amabel, whose cheek, as the other spoke, had returned to its original paleness,—“Patience,” she said, gravely, but kindly, “I have suffered you to proceed too far without interruption, and must correct the very serious error into which you have fallen. I am so far from pining for an interview with the Earl of Rochester, that nothing in the world should induce me to see him again. I have loved him deeply,” she continued in a tremulous tone,—“nay, I will not attempt to disguise that I feel strongly towards him still—and I will also freely confess that his conduct towards me has so preyed upon my spirits that it has impaired, perhaps destroyed, my health. In spite of this result, I cannot sufficiently rejoice that I have escaped the Earl’s snares,—I cannot be sufficiently thankful to the Merciful Being, who, while he has thought fit to chastise me, has preserved me from utter ruin.”

“Since you are of this mind,” returned Patience, in a tone of incredulity, “you are more to be rejoiced with, than pitied. But we are not overheard,” she added, almost in a whisper, and glancing towards the door. “You may entirely confide in me. The time is now arrived when you can escape to your lover.”

“No more of this,” rejoined Amabel, severely, “or I shall command you to leave the room.”

“This is nothing more than pique,” thought Patience. “We women are all hypocrites, even to ourselves. I will serve her whether she will or not. She shall see the Earl. Well, I hope there is no harm in wishing you may be happy with Leonard Holt,” she added aloud. “He will make you a capital husband.”

“That subject is equally disagreeable—equally painful to me,” said Amabel.

“I had better hold my tongue altogether,” rejoined Patience, somewhat pertly. “Whatever I say seems to be wrong. It won’t prevent me, however, from doing as I would be done by,” she added to herself.

Amabel’s preparations finished, she dismissed Patience, to whom she gave some few slight remembrances, and was soon afterwards joined by her father. They passed half an hour together, as on the former night, in serious and devout conversation; after which Mr. Bloundel left her for a few minutes to let down Blaize. On his return, he tenderly embraced her, and led her into the passage. They had not advanced many steps, when Mrs. Bloundel rushed forth to meet them. She was in her night-dress, and seemed overwhelmed with affliction.

“How is this, Honora?” cried her husband, in a severe tone. “You promised me you would see Amabel no more. You will only distress her.”

“I could not let her go thus,” cried Mrs. Bloundel. “I was listening at my chamber-door to hear her depart, and when I caught the sound of her footsteps, I could no longer control myself.” So saying, she rushed to her daughter, and clasped her in her arms.

“Heaven bless you, my dear, dear child,” she cried,

“and may you be restored to us in health and happiness!”

“Farewell, dear mother,” cried Amabel, “and rest assured that while life remains to me you will never be absent from my thoughts. Farewell!”

With this, she gently extricated herself from her mother, who sank against the wall for support, and giving her hand to her father, he conducted her to the little room overlooking the street. Nothing more, except a deep and passionate look, was exchanged between them. Both repressed their emotion, and though the heart of each was bursting, neither shed a tear. At that moment, and for the first time, they greatly resembled each other, and this was not surprising, for intense emotion, whether of grief or joy, will bring out lines in the features that lie hidden at other times.

Without a word, Mr. Bloundel busied himself in arranging the pulley, and calling to those below to prepare for Amabel’s descent, again embraced her, and placing her carefully in the basket, lowered her slowly to the ground. She was received in safety by Leonard, who, lifting her in his arms, placed her on the pillion. The pulley was then drawn up, and her luggage lowered by Mr. Bloundel, which was placed in the saddle-bags by the apprentice.

Every one saw the necessity of terminating this painful scene. A kindly farewell was taken of Hodges. Amabel waved her hand to her father, who withdrew, when at this moment, Patience appeared at the window, and calling to Blaize, threw a little package, tied in a handkerchief, to him. Doctor Hodges took up the parcel and gave it to the porter, who, untying the handkerchief, glanced at a note it enclosed, and striking his horse with a stick, dashed off towards Cheapside.

“Pursue him,” cried Amabel to Leonard, “he is flying to the Earl of Rochester.”

The intimation was sufficient for the apprentice. Urging his horse into a quick pace, he came up with the fugitive just as he had reached Cheapside. Blaize’s mad career had been checked by Nizza Macascree, who, seizing the bridle, had stopped the steed.

Leonard, who was armed with a heavy riding-whip, applied it unsparingly to Blaize’s shoulders.

“Entreat him to hold his hand, dear, good Mistress Amabel,” cried the porter; “it was for your sake alone I made this rash attempt. Patience told me you were dying to see the Earl of Rochester, and made me promise I would ride to Whitehall to acquaint his lordship whither you were going. Here is her letter which I was about to deliver.” And as he spoke, he handed her a note tied with a piece of packthread, and directed in strange and almost illegible characters.

“Do not hurt him more,” said Amabel; “he was not aware of the mischief he was about to commit. And learn from me, Blaize, that, so far from desiring to see the Earl of Rochester, all my anxiety is to avoid him.”

“If I had known that,” returned the porter, “I would not have stirred a step. But Patience assured me the contrary."

By this time, Doctor Hodges had come up, and an explanation ensued. It was agreed, however, that it would be better not to alarm Mr. Bloundel, but to attribute the porter's sudden flight to the ill-management of his steed. Accordingly, they returned to the residence of the grocer, who was anxiously looking out for them; and after a brief delay, during which the saddle-bags were again examined and secured, they departed. Mr. Bloundel looked wistfully after his daughter, and she returned his gaze as long as her blinding eyes would permit her. Her head then declined upon Leonard's shoulder, and she wept fast and freely.

So unwonted was the sound of horses' feet at this period that many a melancholy face was drawn to the windows to gaze at them as they rode by, and Nizza Macasree shuddered as she witnessed the envious glances cast at them by these poor prisoners, for such most of them were. As to Blaize, when they got into Cheapside, he was so terrified by the dismal evidences of the pestilence that met him at every turn, that he could scarcely keep his seat, and it was not until he had drenched himself and his companion with vinegar, and stuffed his mouth with myrrh and zedoary, that he felt anything like composure.

On approaching Newgate-market, they found it entirely deserted; most of the stalls were removed, the shops closed, and the window-shutters nailed up. It was never, in fact, used at all, except by a few countrywomen and higglers, who ventured thither on certain days in the week to sell fresh eggs, butter, poultry, and such commodities. The manner of sale was this. The article disposed of was placed on a flag on one side of the market, near which stood a pump and a trough of water. The vender then retired, while the purchaser approached, took the article, and put its price into the water, whence it was removed when supposed to be sufficiently purified.

As the party passed Grey Friars, the tramp of their horses was mistaken for the dead-cart, and a door was suddenly opened and a corpse brought forth. Leonard would have avoided the spectacle had it been possible, but they were now close to Newgate, where they were detained for a few minutes while their bills-of-health were examined and countersigned by the sergeant of the guard stationed there for that purpose. During this pause Leonard glanced at the grated windows of the prison, the debtors' side of which fronted the street. But not a single face was to be seen. In fact, as has already been stated, the prison was shut up.

The gate was now opened to them, and descending Snow-hill, they entered a region completely devastated by the pestilence. So saddening was the sight, that Leonard involuntarily quickened his horse's pace, resolved to get out of this forlorn district as speedily as possible. He was, however, stopped by an unexpected and fearful impediment. When within a short distance of Holborn-bridge, he observed on the further side a large vehicle, and, unable to make out what it was, though a fearful suspicion crossed him, he slackened his pace. A nearer approach showed that it was a pest-cart, filled with its charnel load. The horse was in the shafts, and was standing quite still. Rising in his stirrups to obtain a better view, Leonard perceived that the driver was lying on the ground at a little distance from the cart, an attitude that proclaimed he had been suddenly attacked by the pestilence, and had probably just expired.

Not choosing to incur the risk of passing this contagious load, Leonard retraced his course as far as Holborn-conduit. He then turned into Seacoal-lane, and making the best of his way to Fleet-bridge, crossed it, and entered the great thoroughfare with which it communicated. He had not proceeded far when he encountered a small party of the watch, to whom he showed his certificate, and detailed the fate of the driver of the dead-cart. At Temple-bar he was again obliged to exhibit his passports, and, while detained there, he observed three other horsemen riding towards them from the further end of Fleet-street.

Though much alarmed by the sight, Leonard did not communicate his apprehensions to his companions, but as soon as the guard allowed him to pass, called out to Blaize to follow him, and urging his horse to a quick pace, dashed up Drury-lane. A few minutes' hard riding, during which nothing occurred to give the apprentice further uneasiness, brought them to a large open space of ground, in which a pest-house had just been built by the chivalrous nobleman whose mansion in Berkshire they were about to visit. With a courage and devotion which redound more to his honour than the brilliant qualities that won him so high a reputation in the court and in the field, Lord Craven not merely provided a receptacle for the sick, but remained in London during the whole continuance of the dreadful visitation; "braving," says Pennant, "the fury of the pestilence with the same coolness as he fought the battles of his beloved mistress, Elizabeth, titular Queen of Bohemia, or mounted the tremendous breach of Creutznach." The spot where this asylum was built, and which is the present site of Golden-square, retained for nearly half a century afterwards the name of the Pest-house-fields. Leonard had already been made acquainted by Doctor Hodges with the Earl's generous devotion to the public welfare, and warmly commenting upon it, he pointed out the structure to Amabel. But the speed at which she was borne along did not allow her time to bestow more than a hasty glance at it. On gaining Hyde Park Corner, the apprentice cast a look behind, and his apprehensions were revived by finding the three horsemen again in view, and evidently using their utmost exertions to come up with them.

CHAPTER XXXI.

WHAT BEFEL BLAIZE AT THE PEST-HOUSE.

WHILE Leonard was hesitating whether he should make known their danger to Amabel, he perceived Solomon Eagle dart from behind a wall on the left of the road, and plant himself in the direct course of their pursuers, and he involuntarily drew in the rein to see what would ensue. In another moment, the horsemen, who were advancing at full gallop,—and whom Leonard now recognized as the Earl of Rochester, Pillichody, and Sir Paul Parravicin,—had approached within a few yards of the enthusiast, and threatened to ride over him, if he did not get out of the way. Seeing, however, that he did not offer to stir, they opened on either side of him, and were passing swiftly by, when, with infinite dexterity, he caught hold of the bridle of Rochester's steed, and checking him, seized the Earl by the leg, and threw him to the ground.

Sir Paul Parravicin pulled up as soon as he could, and, drawing his sword, rode back to assist his friend, and punish the aggressor. But the enthusiast, nothing daunted, met him in full career, and, suddenly lifting up his arms, uttered a loud cry, which so startled the knight's high-spirited horse, that he reared and flung him. All this was the work of a few seconds. Pillichody had been borne forward by the impetuosity of his steed to within a short distance of the apprentice, and seeing the fate of his companions, and not liking Leonard's menacing gestures, he clapped spurs into his horse, and rode up Park-lane.

Overjoyed at his unexpected deliverance, Leonard, whose attention had been completely engrossed by what was passing, now ventured to look at Amabel, and became greatly alarmed at her appearance. She was as pale as death, except a small burning patch of crimson on either cheek, which contrasted powerfully with the death-like hue of the rest of her countenance. Her hands convulsively clasped the back of the pillion; her lips were slightly apart; and her eyes fixed upon the prostrate form of the Earl of Rochester. On finding they were pursued, and by whom, her first impulse had been to fling herself from the horse, and to seek safety by flight, but controlling herself, she awaited the result with forced composure, and was now sinking from exhaustion at the effort.

"Thank heaven! we are safe," cried the apprentice, "but I fear the shock has been too much for you."

"It has," gasped Amabel, falling against his shoulder. "Let us fly—oh! let us fly."

Inexpressibly shocked and alarmed, Leonard twined his left arm round her waist so as to hold her on the steed, for she was utterly unable to support herself, and glancing anxiously at Nizza Macascree, struck off on the right into the road skirting the park, and in the direction of Tyburn, where there was a small inn, at which he hoped to procure assistance. Before reaching this place, he was beyond description relieved to find that Amabel had so far recovered as to be able to raise her head.

"The deadly faintness is passed," she murmured, "I shall be better soon. But I fear I am too weak to pursue the journey at present."

Leonard spurred on his steed, and in another instant reached Tyburn, and drew up at the little inn. But no assistance could be obtained there. The house was closed; there was a red cross on the door; and a watchman stationed in front of it informed him that all the family had died of the plague except the landlord,—“and he will be buried beside them in Paddington churchyard before to-morrow morning,” added the man; “for his nurse tells me it is impossible he can survive many hours.”

As he spoke, an upper window was opened, and a woman thrusting her head out of it, cried, “Poor Master Sandys has just breathed his last. Come in, Philip, and help me to prepare the body for the dead-cart.”

“I will be with you in a minute,” rejoined the watchman. “You may possibly procure accommodation at the Wheat-sheaf at Paddington,” he added to Leonard; “it is but a short distance up the road.”

Thanking him for the information, Leonard took the course indicated. He had not proceeded far, when he was alarmed by hearing a piteous cry of “Stop! stop!” proceeding from Blaize; and halting, found that the porter had been so greatly terrified by the watchman's account of the mortality in the poor innkeeper's family, that he had applied to his phial of plague-water, and in pulling it out, had dropped his box of rufuses, and the jar of anti-pestilential confection. He had just ascertained his loss, and wished to go back, but this Nizza Macascree would not permit. Enraged at the delay, Leonard peremptorily ordered the porter to come on; and Blaize, casting a rueful glance at his treasures, which he perceived at a little distance in the middle of the road, was compelled to obey.

At Paddington, another disappointment awaited them. The Wheatsheaf was occupied by two large families, who were flying from the infected city, and no accommodation could be afforded them. Leonard looked wistfully at Nizza Macascree, as if uncertain what to do, and she was equally perplexed; but the difficulty was relieved by Amabel herself, who said she felt much better, and able to proceed a little further. "Do not return to London," she continued, with great earnestness, "I would rather die on the road than go home again. Some cottage will receive us. If not, I can rest for a short time in the fields."

Thinking it best to comply, Leonard proceeded along the Harrow-road. Soon after quitting Paddington, he overtook a little train of fugitives driving a cart filled with children and laden with luggage. Further on, as he surveyed the beautiful meadows, stretching out on either side of him, he perceived a line of small tents, resembling a gipsy-encampment, pitched at a certain distance from each other, and evidently occupied by families who had fled from their homes from a fear of infection. This gave a singular character to the prospect. But there were other and far more painful sights on the road, which could not fail to attract attention. For the first half mile, almost at every hundred yards might be seen some sick man, who, unable to proceed further, had fallen against the hedge-side, and, exhibiting his sores to move their compassion, implored the aid of the passers by. But these supplications were wholly unheeded. Self-preservation was the first object with all, and the travellers, holding handkerchiefs steeped in vinegar to their faces, and averting their heads, passed by on the other side of the way.

The pestilence, it may be remarked, had visited with extraordinary rigour the whole of the higher country at the west and north-west of the metropolis. The charmingly-situated and, at other seasons, healthful villages of Hampstead and Highgate suffered severely from the scourge, and it even extended its ravages as far as Harrow-on-the-Hill, which it half depopulated. This will account for the circumstance of a large pest-house being erected in the neighbourhood of Westbourne-green, which the party now approached. Two litters were seen borne across the fields in the direction of the hospital, and this circumstance called Leonard's attention to it. Shudderingly averting his gaze, he quickened his pace, and soon reached a small farmhouse on the summit of the hill rising from Kensal-green. Determined to seek a temporary asylum here for Amabel, he opened a gate, and riding into the yard, fortunately met with the owner of the house, a worthy farmer, named Wingfield, to whom he explained her situation. The man at first hesitated, but on receiving Leonard's solemn assurance that she was not attacked by the plague, consented to receive the whole party.

Assisting Amabel to dismount, Wingfield conveyed her in his arms into the house, and delivered her to his wife, bidding her take care of her. The injunction was scarcely needed. The good dame, who was a middle-aged woman, with pleasing features, which lost none of their interest from being stamped with profound melancholy, gazed at her for a moment fixedly, and then observed in an undertone, but with much emotion, to her husband,—“Ah! Robert, how much this sweet creature resembles our poor Sarah!”

“Hush, hush, dame,” rejoined her husband, hastily brushing away the moisture that sprung to his eyes; “take her to your chamber, and see that she wants nothing. There is another young woman outside, whom I will send to you.”

So saying, he returned to the yard. By this time, the others had dismounted; and Wingfield, bidding Nizza Macascree go in, led the way to the barn, where the horses were tied up, and fodder placed before them. This done, he conducted his guests to the house, and placing cold meat, bread, and a jug of ale before them, desired them to fall to.—an injunction which Blaize, notwithstanding his previous repast of roasted figs, and pickled walnuts, very readily complied with. While they were thus employed, Dame Wingfield made her appearance. She said that the poor creature (meaning Amabel) was too ill to proceed on her journey that day, and begged her husband to allow her to stop till the next morning, when she hoped she would be able to undertake it.

“To-morrow morning, say you, dame?” cried Wingfield—“she may stop till the day after, and the day after that, if you desire it, or if she wishes it. Go tell her so.”

And as his wife withdrew, well pleased at having obtained her request, Wingfield addressed himself to Leonard, and inquired the cause of Amabel's illness; and as the apprentice saw no necessity for secrecy, and felt deeply grateful for the kind treatment he had experienced, he acquainted him with the chief particulars of her history. The farmer appeared greatly moved by the recital.

“She resembles my poor Sarah, very strongly,” he said. “My daughter was hurried into an early grave by a villain who won her affections, and betrayed her. She now lies in Willesden churchyard, but her seducer is one of the chief favourites of our profligate monarch.”

“Do you mean the Earl of Rochester?” cried Leonard.

“No, no,” replied the farmer, whose good-natured countenance had assumed a stern expression. “The villain I mean is worse, if possible, than the Earl. He is called Sir Paul Parravicin.”

"Gracious heaven!" exclaimed Leonard, in astonishment—"What a strange coincidence is this!"

And he then proceeded to relate to Wingfield the persecution which Nizza Macascree had endured from the profligate knight. The farmer listened to his recital with breathless interest, and when it was ended, arose, and taking a hasty turn round the room, halted at the table, and struck it forcibly with his clenched hand.

"I hope that man will never cross my path," he said, all the blood mounting to his face, and his eye kindling with fury. "As God shall judge me, I will kill him if I meet him."

"Then I hope you never will meet him," observed Leonard. "He has injured you enough already, without shutting you out of the pale of Divine mercy."

"These rascals have done us all an injury," observed Blaize. "Patience has never been like herself since Major Pilichody entered my master's dwelling, and made love to her. I feel quite uneasy to think how the little hussy will go on during my absence. She can't get out of the house, that's one comfort."

You have mentioned another wretch, who was constantly with Sir Paul," cried Wingfield. "Perdition seize them."

"Ay, perdition seize them!" echoed Blaize, striking the table in his turn—"especially Major Pilichody."

"Did you ever suspect that Sir Paul was of higher rank than he pretended to be," asked Leonard, "and that the name was feigned?"

"No," rejoined Wingfield; "what reason have you for the question?"

Leonard then told him of the inquiries instituted by Doctor Hodges to discover Nizza's retreat, and how they had been baffled. "It is strange," he continued, "that Nizza herself never heard the real name of her persecutor, neither can she tell the house whither she was conveyed when in a fainting condition, and from which she was removed when attacked with the plague, is situated."

"It is strange, indeed," observed the farmer, musingly.

Soon after this, Nizza Macascree made her appearance, and informed them that Amabel had fallen into a tranquil slumber, which in all probability would completely renovate her.

"I hope it will," said Wingfield. "But I shall not part with her to-day."

He then entered into conversation with Nizza, and after a little time, proposed to her and Leonard to walk across the fields with him to Willesden, to visit his daughter's grave.

"My wife will take charge of Amabel," he said; "you may safely trust her in her hands."

Leonard could raise no objection, except the possibility that the Earl of Rochester and his companions might discover their retreat and carry off Amabel in his absence; but after a little reflection, considering this altogether unlikely, he assented, and they set out. A pleasant walk across the fields brought them to the pretty little village of Willesden and its old and beautiful church. They proceeded to the grave of poor Sarah Wingfield, which lay at the east of the church beneath one of the tall elms, and Nizza, as she stood by the rounded sod covering the remains of the unfortunate girl, could not restrain her tears.

"This might have been my own fate," she said. "What an escape I have had!"

"I did not bring you here to read you a lesson," said Wingfield, in a tone of deep emotion, "but because you, who know the temptation to which the poor creature who lies there was exposed, will pity her. Not alone did remorse for her conduct prey upon her spirits,—not alone did she suffer from self reproach,—but the scoffs and jeers of her sex, who never forgive an erring sister, broke her heart. She is now, however, beyond the reach of human malice, and, I trust, at peace."

As he said this, he walked away to hide his emotion, and presently afterwards rejoining them, they quitted the churchyard together.

As they re-crossed the fields, Wingfield observed two men digging a hole in the ground, and guessing their object, paused for a few minutes to watch them. Having thrown out the earth to the depth of a couple of feet, one of them took a long hooked pole, and attaching it to the body of a victim to the pestilence, who had wandered into the fields and died there, dragged it towards the pit. As soon as the corpse was pushed into its narrow receptacle, the clay was shovelled over it, and trodden down.

"This is a sad mode of burial for a Christian," observed Wingfield. "But it would not do to leave an infected body to rot in the fields and spread the contagion."

"Such a grave is better than the plague-pit," rejoined Leonard, recalling the frightful scenes he had witnessed there.

On reaching Wingfield's dwelling, they found from the good dame, that Amabel had awakened from her slumber greatly refreshed; but she gave it as her opinion that she had better remain undisturbed. Accordingly, no one went into the room to her except Nizza Macascree. A substantial dinner was provided for his guests by the hospitable farmer; and Blaize, who had been for some time confined to salt provisions at his master's house, did ample justice to the fresh meat and vegetables.

The meal over, Leonard, who felt exceedingly curious to learn what had become of the mysterious stranger whose child he had carried to the plague-pit, and who had appeared so strangely interested in Nizza Macascree, determined to walk to the pest-house in Finsbury-fields, and inquire after him. On communicating his intention to his host, Wingfield would have dissuaded him, but as Leonard affirmed he had no fear of infection, he desisted from the attempt. Just as the apprentice was starting, Blaize came up to him and said,—“Leonard, I have a great curiosity to see a pest-house, and should like to go with you, if you will let me.”

The apprentice stared at him in astonishment.

“You will never dare to enter it,” he said.

“I will go wherever you go,” replied the porter, with a confidence mainly inspired by the hospitable farmer's strong ale.

“We shall see,” replied Leonard. “I shall keep you to your word.”

In less than an hour, they reached Marylebone-fields (now the Regent's-park), and crossing them, entered a lane, running in pretty nearly the same direction as the present New-road. It brought them to Clerkenwell, whence they proceeded to Finsbury-fields, and soon came within sight of the pest-house. When Blaize found himself so near this dreaded asylum, all his courage vanished.

“I would certainly enter the pest-house with you,” he said to Leonard, “but I have used up all my vinegar, and you know that I lost my box of rufuses and the pot of anti-pestilential confection this morning.”

“That excuse shall not serve your turn,” replied Leonard. “You can get plenty of vinegar and plague medicines in the pest-house.”

“But I have no money to pay for them,” rejoined Blaize.

“I will lend you some,” said Leonard, placing a few pieces in his hand. “Now, come along.”

Blaize would fain have run away, but afraid of incurring the apprentice's anger, he walked tremblingly after him. They entered the garden-gate, and soon reached the principal door, which, as usual, stood open. Scarcely able to support himself, the porter tottered into the large room; but as he cast his eyes around, and beheld the miserable occupants of the pallets, and heard their cries and groans, he was so scared that he could not move another step, but stood like one transfixed with terror. Paying little attention to him, Leonard walked forward, and at the further extremity of the chamber found the young surgeon whom he had formerly seen, and, describing the stranger, inquired where he was placed.

“The person you allude to has been removed,” returned the surgeon. “Doctor Hodges visited him this morning, and had him conveyed to his own dwelling.”

“Was he sensible at the time?” asked the apprentice.

“I think not,” replied the surgeon; “but the doctor appeared to recognise in him an old friend, though I did not hear him mention his name, and it was on that account, I conclude, that he had him removed.”

“Is he likely to recover?” asked Leonard, whose curiosity was aroused by what he heard.

“That is impossible to say,” replied the young man.

“But he cannot be in better hands.”

Leonard continued conversing for a few minutes longer with the young surgeon, and then, thanking him for his information, turned to depart. Not seeing Blaize he concluded he had gone forth, and expected to find him in the garden, or, at all events, in the field adjoining. But he was nowhere to be found. While Leonard was wondering what had become of him, he heard a loud cry, in the voice of the porter, issuing from the barn, which, as has already been stated, had been converted into a receptacle for the sick; and hurrying thither, found Blaize in the hands of a couple of stout assistants, who had stripped him of his clothes, and were tying him down to a pallet. On seeing Leonard, Blaize implored him to deliver him from the hands of his persecutors; and the apprentice assuring the assistants that the poor fellow was perfectly free from infection, they liberated him.

It appeared, on inquiry, that Blaize, scared by what he had seen, had fallen against one of the pallets in a state almost of insensibility, and the two assistants, chancing to pass at the time, and taking him for a plague patient, had conveyed him to the barn. Before he reached it, he recovered, and besought them to set him free, but they paid no attention to his cries, and proceeded to strip him, and bind him to the bed, as before related.

Thus released, the porter lost no time in dressing himself; and Leonard, to allay his terrors, had a strong dose of anti-pestilential elixir administered to him. After which, having procured him a box of rufuses, and a phial of plague-water, Blaize shook off his apprehension, and they set out at a brisk pace for Kensal-green.

CHAPTER XXXII.

THE JOURNEY.

BLAIZE was destined to undergo another fright. It has been mentioned that the infected were sometimes seized with a rabid desire of communicating the disorder to such as had not been attacked by it; and as the pair were making the best of their way along the Harrow-road, a poor lazar, who was lying against the hedge side, and had vainly implored their assistance, suddenly started up, and with furious gestures and cries, made towards the porter. Guessing his intention, Blaize took to his heels, and finding himself closely pressed, broke through the hedge on the right, and speeded across the field. In spite of the alarming nature of the occurrence, the apprentice could not help laughing at the unwonted agility displayed by the fat little porter, who ran so swiftly that it appeared probable he would distance his pursuer. To prevent mischief, however, Leonard set off after them, and was fast gaining upon the lazar, whose strength was evidently failing, when the poor wretch uttered a loud cry, and fell to the ground. On coming up, Leonard found him lying with his face in the grass, and convulsed by the agonies of death, and perceiving all was over with him, hurried after the porter, whom he found seated on a gate, at the further end of the field, solacing himself with a draught of plague-water.

"Oh, Leonard!" he groaned, "how little do we know what is for our good! I was delighted to quit my master's house this morning, but I now wish with all my heart that I was back again. I am sadly afraid I shall not escape the plague. Pray what are the first symptoms?"

"Poh! poh! don't think about it, and you will take no harm," rejoined Leonard. "Put up your phial, and let us make the best of our way to Farmer Wingfield's."

Being now in sight of the farm, which, from its elevated situation, could be distinguished at the distance of two miles in this direction, they easily shaped their course towards it across the fields. When about half way up the hill, Leonard paused to look behind him. The view was exquisite, and it was precisely the hour (just before sunset) at which it could be seen to the greatest advantage. On the right, his gaze wandered to the beautiful and well-wooded heights of Richmond and Wimbledon, beyond which he traced the long line of the Surrey hills, while nearer he perceived Notting-hill, now crowded with habitations, but then a verdant knoll, covered with a few trees, but without so much as a cottage upon it. On the left stood Hampstead, at that time a collection of pretty cottages, but wanting its present chief ornament, the church. At the foot of the hill, rich meadows, bordered with fine hedges, interspersed with young oaks and larger timber, spread out as far as the eye could reach. Nothing destroyed the rural character of the prospect, nor was there any indication of the neighbourhood of a great city, except the lofty tower and massive body of Saint Paul's, which appeared above the tops of the intervening trees in the distance.

As on former occasions, when contemplating the surrounding country from the summit of the cathedral, Leonard could not help contrasting the beauty of the scene before him with the horrible scourge by which it was ravaged. Never had the country looked so beautiful—never, therefore, was the contrast so forcible; and it appeared to him like a lovely mask hiding the hideous and ghastly features of death. Coloured by the sombre hue of his thoughts, the whole scene changed its aspect in the eyes of the apprentice. The smiling landscape seemed to darken, and the cool air of evening to become hot and noisome, as if laden with the deadly exhalations of the pestilence. Nor did the workings of his imagination stop here. He fancied even at this distance,—nearly seven miles,—that he could discern Solomon Eagle on the summit of the cathedral. At first, the figure looked like a small black speck, but it gradually dilated until it became twice the size of the cathedral, upon the central tower of which its feet rested, while its arms were spread abroad over the city. In its right hand the gigantic figure held a blazing torch, and in the left a vial from the mouth of which a stream of dark liquid descended. So vividly did this phantasm present itself to Leonard, that, almost convinced of its reality, he placed his hands before his eyes for a few moments, and on withdrawing them, was glad to find that the delusion was occasioned by a black cloud over the cathedral, which his distempered fancy had transformed into the colossal figure of the enthusiast.

Blaize, who had taken the opportunity of his companion's abstraction to sip a little more plague-water, now approached, and told him that Wingfield was coming down the hill to meet them. Rousing himself, Leonard ran towards the farmer, who appeared delighted to see them back again, and conducted them to his dwelling. Owing to the tender and truly maternal attention of Dame Wingfield, Amabel was so much better that she was able to join the party at supper, though she took no share in the meal. Wingfield listened to the low, sweet tones of her voice, as she conversed with his wife, and at last, unable to control his emotion, laid down his knife and fork, and quitted the table.

"What is the matter with your husband?" inquired Amabel of her hostess. "I hope he is not unwell."

"Oh! no," replied the good dame. "Your voice reminds him of our daughter, whose history I have related to you,—that is all!"

"Alas!" exclaimed Amabel, with a sympathizing look, "I will be silent, if it distresses him to hear me speak."

"On no account," rejoined Dame Wingfield. "The tears he has shed will relieve him. He could not weep when poor Sarah died, and I feared his heart would break. Talk to him as you talked to me, and you will do him a world of good."

Shortly afterwards, the farmer returned to the table, and the meal proceeded to its close without further interruption. As soon as the board was cleared, Wingfield took a chair by Amabel, who, in compliance with his wife's request, spoke to him about his daughter, and in terms calculated to afford him consolation.

Leonard was enraptured by her discourse, and put so little constraint upon his admiration, that Nizza Macascree could not repress a pang of jealousy. As to Blaize, who had eaten as much as he could cram, and emptied a large jug of the farmer's stout ale, he took his chair to a corner, and speedily fell asleep; his hoarse but tranquil breathing proving that the alarms he had undergone during the day did not haunt his slumbers. Before separating for the night, Amabel entreated that prayers might be said, and her request being readily granted, she was about to retire with Nizza, when Wingfield detained them.

"I have been thinking that I might offer you a safe asylum here," he said. "If you like it, you shall remain with us till your health is fully reinstated. We will be as a father and mother to you."

"I thank you most kindly," returned Amabel gratefully; "and if I do not accept the offer, it is not because I should not esteem myself safe here, nor because I am unwilling to be indebted to your hospitality, but that I have been specially advised, as my last chance of recovery, to try the air of Berkshire. I have little hope myself, but I owe it to those who love me, to make the experiment."

"If such is the case," returned the farmer, "I will not attempt to persuade you further. But if, at any future time, you should need change of air, my house shall be entirely at your service."

Dame Wingfield warmly seconded her husband's offer, and with renewed thanks, Amabel and her companion withdrew. As there was not sufficient room for their accommodation within the house, Leonard and the porter took up their quarters in the barn, and throwing themselves upon a heap of straw, slept soundly till three o'clock, when they arose, and began to prepare for their journey. Wingfield was likewise astir, and after assisting them to feed and dress their horses, took them into the house, where a plentiful breakfast awaited them. At the close of the meal, Amabel and Nizza, who had breakfasted in their own room, made their appearance. All being in readiness for their departure, Dame Wingfield took leave of her guests with tears in her eyes, and the honest farmer was little less affected. Both gazed after them as long as they continued in sight.

Having ascertained from Wingfield the route they ought to pursue, Leonard proceeded about a quarter of a mile along the Harrow-road, and then turned off on the left into a common, which brought them to Acton, whence they threaded a devious lane to Brentford. Here they encountered several fugitives from the great city, and as they approached Hounslow, learnt from other wayfarers that a band of highwaymen by whom the heath was infested had become more than usually audacious since the outbreak of the pestilence, and claimed a heavy tax from all travellers. This was bad news to Leonard, who became apprehensive for the safety of the bag of gold given to Nizza by the enthusiast, and he would have taken another road, if it had been practicable; but as there was no alternative except to proceed, he put all the money he had about him into a leathern purse, hoping that the highwaymen, if they attacked them, would be content with it, and not search further for it.

When about half way across the vast heath, which spread out, in a wild but not unpicturesque expanse, for many miles on either side, Leonard perceived a band of horsemen, amounting perhaps to a dozen, galloping towards them, and not doubting they were the robbers in question, communicated his suspicions to his companions. Neither Amabel nor Nizza Macascree appeared much alarmed, but Blaize was so terrified that he could scarcely keep his seat, and was with difficulty prevented from turning his horse's head, and riding off in the opposite direction.

By this time, the highwaymen had come up. With loud oaths two of their number held pistols to the heads of Leonard and Blaize, and demanded their money. The apprentice replied by drawing forth his purse, and besought the fellow to whom he gave it not to maltreat his companion. The man rejoined, with a savage imprecation, that he "would maltreat them both if they did not instantly dismount, while he searched the saddle-bags;" and he was proceeding to drag Amabel from the saddle, when Leonard struck him a violent blow with his heavy riding whip, an brought him to the ground. He was up again however, in an instant, and would have fired his pistol at the apprentice, if a masked individual, evidently, from the richness of his attire, and the deference paid him by the others, the captain of the band, had not interfered.

"You are rightly served, Dick Dosset," said this person, in an angry tone, "for your rudeness to a lady. I will have none of my band guilty of incivility, and if this young man had not punished you, I would have done so myself. Pass free, my pretty damsel," he added, altering his manner, and bowing gallantly to Amabel; "you shall not be further molested."

Meanwhile, Blaize exhibited the contents of his pockets to the other highwayman, who, having opened the box of rufuses, and smelt at the phial of plague-water, returned them to him with a look of ineffable disgust, and bade him follow his companions. As Leonard was departing, the captain of the band rode after him, and inquired whether he had heard at what hour the King meant to leave Whitehall?

"The court is about to adjourn to Oxford," he added, "and the King and some of his courtiers will cross the heath to-day, when I propose to levy the same tax from his Majesty that I do from his subjects."

Leonard replied, that he was utterly ignorant of the King's movements, and explaining where he came from, the captain left him. The intelligence he had thus accidentally obtained was far from satisfactory to the apprentice. For some distance, their road would be the same as that about to be taken by the monarch and his attendants, amongst whom it was not improbable Rochester might be numbered; and the possibility that the Earl might overtake them and discover Amabel, filled him with uneasiness. Concealing his alarm, however, he urged his steed to a quicker pace, and proceeded briskly on his way, satisfied that, at least, he had preserved Solomon Eagle's gift to Nizza. Amabel's weakly condition compelled them to rest at frequent intervals, and it was not until evening began to draw in that they descended the steep hill leading to the beautiful village of Henley-upon-Thames, where they proposed to halt for the night.

Crossing the bridge, they found a considerable number of the inhabitants assembled in the main street and in the market-place, in expectation of the King's passing through the town on his way to Oxford; intimation of his approach having been conveyed by avant-couriers. Leonard proceeded to the principal inn, and was fortunate enough to procure accommodation. Having conducted Amabel and Nizza to their room, he was repairing to the stable with Blaize to see after their steeds, when a loud blowing of horns was heard on the bridge, succeeded by the tramp of horses, and the rattling of wheels, and the next moment, four valets in splendid livery rode up, followed by a magnificent coach. The shouts of the assemblage proclaimed that it was the King. The cavalcade stopped before the inn, from the yard of which six magnificently caparisoned horses were brought, and attached to the royal carriage in the place of others which had been removed. Charles was laughing heartily, and desired his attendants, who were neither numerous nor well armed, to take care they were not robbed again between this place and Oxford: "though," added the monarch, "it is now of little consequence, since we have nothing to lose."

"Is it possible your Majesty can have been robbed?" inquired the landlord, who stood cap in hand at the door of the carriage.

"I faith man, it is possible," rejoined the King. "We were stopped on Hounslow Heath by a band of highwaymen, who carried off two large coffers filled with gold, and would have eased us of our swords and snuff-boxes, but for the interposition of their captain, who, as we live, is one of the politest men breathing—is he not, Rochester?"

Leonard Holt, who was among the crowd of spectators, started at the mention of this name, and he trembled as the Earl leaned forward, in answer to the King's question. The eyes of the rivals met at this moment, for both were within a few yards of each other, and Rochester, whose cheek flushed with anger, solicited the King's permission to alight, but Charles, alleging it was getting late, would not permit him, and as the horses were harnessed, and the drivers mounted, he ordered them to proceed without delay.

Inexpressibly relieved by his rival's departure, Leonard returned to the house, and acquainted Amabel with what had occurred. Quitting Henley betimes on the following morning, they arrived in about three hours at Wallingford, where they halted for some time, and then, pursuing their journey, reached Wantage at four o'clock, where they tarried for an hour. Up to this time, Leonard had doubted the possibility of reaching their destination that night; but Amabel assuring him she felt no fatigue, he determined to push on. Accordingly, having refreshed their steeds, they set forward, and soon began to mount the beautiful downs lying on the west of this ancient town.

Crossing these heights, whence they obtained the most magnificent and extensive views of the surrounding country, they reached in about three-quarters of an hour the pretty little hamlet of Kingston Lisle. Here they again paused at a small inn, at the foot of a lofty hill, denominated, from a curious relic kept there, the Blowing Stone. This rocky fragment, which is still in existence, is perforated by a number of holes, which emit, if blown into, a strange bellowing sound. Unaware of this, Leonard had entered the house with the others, and had just seated himself, when they were astounded by a strange unearthly roar. Rushing forth, Leonard found Blaize with his cheeks puffed out, and his mouth applied to the stone, into which he was blowing with all his force, and producing the above-mentioned extraordinary noise.

Shortly after this, the party quitted the Blowing Stone, and having toiled up the steep sides of the hill, they were amply repaid on reaching its summit by one of the finest views they had ever beheld. In fact, the hill on which they stood commanded the whole of the extensive and beautiful vale of the White Horse, which opened upon them like a vast panorama, disclosing a thousand fields covered with abundant, though as yet immature crops. It was a goodly prospect, and seemed to promise plenty and prosperity to the country. Almost beneath them stood the reverend church of Uffington, overtopping the ancient village clustering round it. Numerous other towers and spires could be seen peeping out of groves of trees, which, together with the scattered mansions and farm-houses, surrounded by granges and stacks of hay and beans, gave interest and diversity to the prospect. The most prominent objects in the view were the wooded heights of Faringdon, on the one hand, and those of Abingdon on the other.

Proceeding along the old Roman road, still distinctly marked out, and running along the ridge of this beautiful chain of hills, they arrived at an immense Roman encampment, vulgarly called Uffington Castle, occupying the summit of a hill. A shepherd who was tending a flock of sheep which were browsing on the delicious herbage to be found within the vast circular space inclosed by the inner vallum of the camp, explained its purpose, and they could not but regard it with interest. He informed them that they were in the neighbourhood of the famous White Horse, a figure cut out of the turf on the hill side by the Saxons, and visible for many miles. Conducting them to a point whence they could survey this curious work, their guide next directed them to Ashdown Lodge, which lay, he told them, about four miles distant. They had wandered a little out of their course, but he accompanied them for a mile, until they came in sight of a thick grove of trees, clothing the hollow of the hills, above which could be seen the lofty cupola of the mansion.

Cheered by the sight, and invigorated by the fresh breeze blowing in this healthful region, they pressed forward, and soon drew near the mansion, which they found was situated in the midst of a wood, and approached by four noble avenues. They had not advanced far, when a gigantic personage, six feet two high, and proportionately stoutly made, issued from the covert. He had a gun over his shoulder, and was attended by a couple of fine dogs. Telling them he was called John Lutcombe, and was the Earl of Craven's game-keeper, he inquired their business; and on being acquainted with it, changed his surly manner to one of great kindness, and informed them that Mrs. Buscot,—such was the name of Amabel's aunt,—was at home, and would be heartily glad to see them.

"I have often heard her speak of her brother, Mr. Bloundel," he said; "and am well aware that he is an excellent man. Poor soul! she has been very uneasy about him and his family during this awful dispensation, though she had received a letter to say that he was about to close his house, and hoped, under the blessing of Providence, to escape the pestilence. His daughter will be right welcome, and she cannot come to a healthier spot than Ashdown, nor to a better nurse than Mrs. Buscot."

With this, he led the way to the stables, and entering the dwelling, presently returned with a middle-aged woman, whom Amabel instantly knew, from her likeness to her father, must be her aunt. Mrs. Buscot caught her in her arms, and almost smothered her with kisses. As soon as the first transports of surprize and joy had subsided, the good house-keeper took her niece and Nizza Macascree into the house, and ordered John Lutcombe to attend to the others.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

ASHDOWN LODGE.

ERECTED by Inigo Jones, and still continuing in precisely the same state as at the period of this history, Ashdown Lodge is a large square edifice, built in the formal French taste of the seventeenth century, with immense casements, giving it the appearance of being all glass; a high roof lighted by dormer windows, terminated at each angle by a tall and not very ornamental chimney, and surmounted by a lotty and lantern-like belvedere, crowned in its turn by a glass cupola. The belvedere opens upon a square gallery defended by a broad balustrade, and overlooking the umbrageous masses and lovely hills around it. The house, as has been stated, is approached by four noble avenues, the timber constituting which is of course much finer now than at the period under consideration, and possesses a delightful old-fashioned garden, and stately terrace. The rooms are lofty but small, and there is a magnificent staircase, occupying nearly half the interior of the building. Among other portraits decorating the walls is one of Elizabeth Stuart, daughter of James the First, and Queen of Bohemia, for whom the first Earl of Craven entertained so romantic an attachment, and to whom he was supposed to be privately united. Nothing can be more secluded than the situation of the mansion, lying as it does in the midst of a gentle valley, surrounded by a thick wood, and without having a single habitation in view. Its chief interest, however, must always be derived from its connection with the memory of the chivalrous and high-souled nobleman by whom it was erected, and who made it occasionally his retreat after the death of his presumed royal consort, which occurred about four years previous to the date of this history.

Amabel was delighted with her new abode, and she experienced the kindness of a parent from her aunt, with whom, owing to circumstances, she had not hitherto been personally acquainted, having only seen her when too young to retain any recollection of the event. The widow of a farmer, who had resided on Lord Craven's estate, near Kingston Lisle, Mrs. Buscot, after her husband's death, had been engaged as housekeeper at Ashdown Lodge, and had filled the situation for many years to the entire satisfaction of her employer. She was two or three years older than her brother, Mr. Bloundel; but the perfect health she enjoyed, and which she attributed to the salubrious air of the downs, combined with her natural cheerfulness of disposition, made her look much the younger of the two. Her features, besides their kindly and benevolent expression, were extremely pleasing, and must, some years ago, have been beautiful. Even now, what with her fresh complexion, her white teeth, and plump figure, she made no slight pretensions to comeliness. She possessed the same good sense and integrity of character as her brother, together with his strong religious feeling, but entirely unaccompanied by austerity.

Having no children, she was able to bestow her entire affections upon Amabel, whose sad story, when she became acquainted with it, painfully affected her; nor was she less concerned at her precarious state of health. For the first day or two after her arrival, Amabel suffered greatly from the effects of the journey, but after that time, she gained strength so rapidly, that Mrs. Buscot, who, at first, had well-nigh despaired of her recovery, began to indulge a hope. The gentle sufferer would sit throughout the day with her aunt and Nizza Macascree in the gallery near the belvedere, inhaling the pure breeze blowing from the surrounding hills, and stirring the tree-tops beneath her.

"I never expected so much happiness," she observed, on one occasion, to Mrs. Buscot, "and begin to experience the truth of Doctor Hodges's assertion, that with returning health the desire of life would return. I now wish to live."

"I am heartily glad to hear you say so," replied Mrs. Buscot, "and hold it a certain sign of your speedy restoration to health. Before you have been a month with me, I expect to bring back the roses to those pale cheeks."

"You are too sanguine, I fear, dear aunt," rejoined Amabel; "but the change that has taken place in my feelings, may operate beneficially upon my constitution."

"No doubt of it, my dear," replied Mrs. Buscot; "no doubt."

The good dame felt a strong inclination at this moment to introduce a subject very near her heart, but feeling doubtful as to its reception, she checked herself. The devoted attachment of the apprentice to her niece, had entirely won her regard, and she fondly hoped she should be able to wean Amabel from all thought of the Earl of Rochester, and induce her to give her hand to her faithful lover. With this view, she often spoke to her of Leonard,—of his devotion and constancy,—his good looks and excellent qualities, and though Amabel assented to all she said, Mrs. Buscot was sorry to perceive that the impression she desired was not produced. It was not so with Nizza Macascree. Whenever Leonard's name was mentioned, her eye sparkled, her cheek glowed, and she responded so warmly to all that was said in his praise, that Mrs. Buscot soon found out the state of her heart. The discovery occasioned her some little disquietude, for the worthy creature could not bear the idea of making even her niece happy at the expense of another.

As to the object of all this tender interest, he felt far happier than he had done for some time. He saw Amabel every day, and noted with unspeakable delight the gradual improvement which appeared to be taking place in her health. The greater part of his time, however, was not passed in her society, but in threading the intricacies of the woods, or in rambling over the neighbouring downs; and he not only derived pleasure from these rambles, but his health and spirits, which had been not a little shaken by the awful scenes he had recently witnessed, were materially improved. Here, at last, he seemed to have got rid of the grim spectre which, for two months, had constantly haunted him. No greater contrast can be conceived than his present quiet life offered to the fearful excitement he had recently undergone. For hot and narrow thoroughfares reeking with pestilential effluvia, resounding with frightful shrieks or piteous cries, and bearing on every side marks of the destructive progress of the scourge—for these terrible sights and sounds,—for the charnel horrors of the plague-pit,—the scarcely-less revolting scenes at the pest-house,—the dismal bell announcing the dead-cart,—the doleful cries of the buriers,—for graves surfeited with corruption, and streets filled with the dying and the dead,—and, above all, for the ever-haunting expectation that a like fate might be his own,—he had exchanged green hills, fresh breezes, spreading views, the song of the lark, and a thousand other delights and assurances of health and contentment. Often, as he gazed from the ridge of the downs into the wide-spread vale beneath, he wondered whether the destroying angel had smitten any of its peaceful habitations, and breathed a prayer for their preservation.

But the satisfaction he derived from having quitted the infected city, was trifling compared with that of Blaize, whose sole anxiety was lest he should be sent back to London. Seldom straying farther than the gates of the mansion, though often invited by John Lutcombe to accompany him to some of the neighbouring villages,—having little to do, and less to think of, unless to calculate how much he could consume at the next meal, for he had banished all idea of the plague,—he conceived himself at the summit of happiness, and waxed so sleek and round that his face shone like a full moon, while his doublet would scarcely meet around his waist.

One day, about a fortnight after their arrival, and when things were in this happy state, Amabel, who was seated as usual in the gallery at the summit of the house, observed a troop of horsemen, very gallantly equipped, appear at the further end of the northern avenue. An irrepressible terror seized her, and she would have fled into the house, but her limbs refused their office.

"Look there!" she cried to Nizza, who, at that moment, presented herself at the glass-door. "Look there!" she said, pointing to the cavalcade; "what I dreaded has come to pass. The Earl of Rochester has found me out, and is coming hither to carry me off. But I will die rather than accompany him."

"You may be mistaken," replied Nizza, expressing a hopefulness which her looks belied; "it may be the Earl of Craven."

"You give me new life," rejoined Amabel; "but no—no—my aunt has told me that the good Earl will not quit the city during the continuance of the plague. And see! some of the horsemen have distinguished us, and are waving their hats. My heart tells me the Earl of Rochester is amongst them. Give me your arm, Nizza, and I will try to gain some place of concealment."

"Ay, let us fly," replied the other, assisting her towards the door; "I am in equal danger with yourself, for Sir Paul Parravicin is doubtless with them. Oh! where—where is Leonard?"

"He must be below," cried Amabel. "But he could not aid us at this juncture. We must depend upon ourselves."

Descending a short staircase, they entered Amabel's chamber, and fastening the door, awaited with breathless anxiety the arrival of the horsemen. Though the room whither they had retreated was in the upper part of the house, they could distinctly hear what was going on below, and shortly afterwards the sound of footsteps on the stairs, blended with merry voices and loud laughter—amid which Amabel could distinguish the tones of the Earl of Rochester—reached them.

While both were palpitating with fright, the handle of the door was tried, and a voice announced that the apprentice was without.

"All is lost!" he cried, speaking through the key-hole; "the King is here, and is accompanied by the Earl of Rochester and other profligates."

"The King!" exclaimed Amabel joyfully; "then I am no longer apprehensive."

"As yet, no inquiries have been made after you," continued Leonard, unconscious of the effect produced by his intelligence; "but it is evident they know you are here. Be prepared, therefore."

"I am prepared," rejoined Amabel. And as she spoke, she threw open the door and admitted Leonard. "Do not stay with us," she added to him. "In case of need, I will throw myself on his Majesty's protection."

"It will avail you little," rejoined Leonard distrustfully.

"I do not think so," said Amabel, confidently. "I have faith in his acknowledged kindness of heart."

"Perhaps, you are right," returned Leonard. "Mrs. Buscot is at present with his Majesty in the receiving-room. Will you not make fast your door?"

"No," replied Amabel, firmly; "if the King will not defend me, I will defend myself."

Leonard glanced at her with admiration, but he said nothing.

"Is Sir Paul Parravicin here?" asked Nizza Mascree, with great anxiety.

"I have not seen him," replied Leonard; "and I have carefully examined the countenances of all the King's attendants."

"Heaven be praised!" exclaimed Nizza.

At this juncture, Mrs. Buscot entered the room. Her looks bespoke great agitation, and she trembled violently.

"You have no doubt heard from Leonard that the King and his courtiers are below," she said. "His Majesty inquired whether you were here, and I did not dare to deceive him. He desires to see you, and has sent me for you. What is to be done?" she added, with a look of distraction. "I suppose you must obey."

"There is no alternative," replied Amabel. "I will obey his Majesty's commands as soon as I can collect myself. Take back that answer, dear aunt."

"Has Leonard told you that the Earl of Rochester is here?" pursued Mrs. Buscot.

Amabel replied in the affirmative.

"God grant that good may come of it!" cried Mrs. Buscot, clasping her hands together, as she quitted the room; "but I am sorely afraid."

A half-suppressed groan from the apprentice told that he shared in her apprehensions.

"Leave us, Leonard," said Amabel; "I would prepare myself for the interview."

The apprentice obeyed, and closing the door behind him, stationed himself at the foot of the staircase. Left alone with Nizza, Amabel threw herself on her knees, and besought the support of Heaven on this occasion. She then arose, and giving her hand to Nizza, they went down stairs together. Leonard followed them at a little distance, and with a beating heart. Two gentlemen-ushers were posted at the door of the chamber occupied by the King. Not far from them stood Mrs. Buscot, who made known her niece to the officials, and they instantly admitted her, but ordered Nizza to remain outside.

On entering the room, Amabel instantly discovered the King. He was habited in a magnificent riding-dress, and seated at a table, around which were grouped a dozen gaily-attired courtiers, amongst whom were the Earl of Rochester and Sir George Etherege. As Amabel advanced, glances of insolent curiosity were directed towards her, and Rochester stepping forward, offered to lead her to the King; but she declined the attention. Greatly mortified, the Earl would have seized her hand; but there was so much dignity in her deportment, so much coldness in her looks, that in spite of himself, he felt abashed. Charles smiled at his favourite's rebuff, but, in common with the others, he could not help being struck by Amabel's extraordinary beauty and natural dignity, and he observed in an undertone to Etherege, "Is it possible this can be a grocer's daughter?"

"She passes for such, my liege," replied Etherege, with a smile. "But I cannot swear to her parentage."

"Since I have seen her, I do not wonder at Rochester's extravagant passion," rejoined the Monarch. "But, oddsfish! she seems to care little for him."

Having approached within a short distance of the King, Amabel would have prostrated herself before him, but he prevented her.

"Nay, do not kneel, sweetheart," he said; "I am fully satisfied of your loyalty, and never exact homage from one of your sex, but, on the contrary, am ever ready to pay it to them. I have heard much of your attractions, and, what is seldom the case in such matters, find they have not been overrated. The brightest of our court beauties cannot compare with you."

"A moment ago, the fair Amabel might be said to lack bloom," observed Etherege; "but your Majesty's praises have called a glowing colour to her cheek."

"Will you deign to grant me a moment's hearing, my liege?" said Amabel, looking steadfastly at the King.

"Not a moment's hearing merely, sweetheart," returned Charles; "but an hour's, if you list. I could dwell on the music of your tones for ever."

"I thank your Majesty for your condescension," replied Amabel; "but I will not long trespass on your patience. What I have to say concerns the Earl of Rochester."

"Stand forward, my lord," said the King to the Earl, "and let us hear what complaint the damsel has to make against you."

Rochester advanced, and threw a passionate and half-reproachful glance at Amabel.

"It may be improper for me to trouble your Majesty on so light a matter," said Amabel; "but your kindness emboldens me to speak unreservedly. You may be aware that this nobleman once entertained, or feigned to entertain, an ardent attachment for me."

"I need scarcely assure you, my liege," interposed Rochester, "that it was no feigned passion; and that however ardently I felt towards my fair accuser then, my passion has in nowise abated."

"I should wonder if it had," rejoined Charles gallantly.

"I will not contradict you, my lord," said Amabel;
2 M

"it is possible you may have loved me, though I find it difficult to reconcile your professions of regard with your conduct. But this is not to the purpose. Whether you loved me or not, I loved you—deeply and devotedly. There is no sacrifice I would not have made for him," she continued, turning to the King, "and influenced by these feelings, and deluded by false promises, I forgot my duty, and was rash enough to quit my home with him."

"All this I have heard, sweetheart," replied Charles. "There is nothing very remarkable in it. It is the ordinary course of such affairs. I am happy to be the means of restoring your lover to you, and, in fact, came hither for that express purpose."

"You mistake me, my liege," replied Amabel. "I do not desire to have him restored to me. Fortunately for myself, I have succeeded in mastering my love for him. The struggle has well nigh cost me my life—but I have conquered."

"I am yet to learn, sweetheart," observed Charles, with an incredulous look, "that woman's love, if deeply fixed, can be overcome."

"If I had not been supported by religion, my liege, I could not have overcome it," rejoined Amabel. "Night and day I have passed in supplicating the Great Power that implanted this fatal passion in my breast, and, at length, my prayers have prevailed."

"Aha! we have a devotee here!" thought Charles. "Am I to understand, fair saint, that you would reject the Earl, if he were to offer you his hand?" he asked.

"Unquestionably, my liege," replied Amabel, firmly.

"This is strange," muttered Charles. "The girl is evidently in earnest. What says your lordship?" he added to Rochester.

"That she shall be mine, whether she loves me or not," replied the Earl. "My pride is piqued to the conquest."

"No wonder!—the resistless Rochester to be flouted by a grocer's daughter. Ha! ha!" observed Charles, laughing, while the rest of the courtiers joined in his merriment.

"Oh! sire," exclaimed Amabel, throwing herself at the King's feet, and bursting into tears, "do not abandon me, I beseech you. I cannot requite the Earl's attachment—and shall die if he continues his pursuit. Command him—oh! command him to desist."

"I fear you have not dealt fairly with me, sweetheart," said the King. "There is a well-favoured youth without, whom the Earl pointed out as your father's apprentice. Have you transferred your affections to him?"

"Your Majesty has solved the enigma," observed Rochester bitterly.

"You wrong me, my lord," replied Amabel. "Leonard Holt is without. Let him be brought into the royal presence and interrogated; and if he will affirm that I have given him the slightest encouragement by look or word, or even state that he himself indulges a hope of holding a place in my regards, I will admit there is some foundation for the charge. I pray your Majesty to send for him."

"It is needless," replied Charles, coldly. "I do not doubt your assertion. But you will do the Earl an injustice as well as yourself, if you do not allow him a fair hearing."

"If you will allow me five minutes alone with you, Amabel, or will take a single turn with me on the terrace, I will engage to remove every doubt," insinuated Rochester.

"You would fail to do so, my lord," replied Amabel. "The time is gone by when those accents, once so winning in my ear, can move me."

"At least give me the opportunity," implored the Earl.

"No," replied Amabel, decidedly, "I will never willingly meet you more; for though I am firm in my purpose, I do not think it right to expose myself to temptation. And now that I have put your Majesty fully in possession of my sentiments," she added to the King,—"now that I have told you with what bitter tears I have striven to wash out my error,—I implore you to extend your protecting hand toward me, and to save me from further persecution on the part of the Earl."

"I shall remain at this place to-night," returned Charles. "Take till to-morrow to consider of it, and if you continue in the same mind, your request shall be granted."

"At least, enjoin the Earl to leave me unmolested till then," cried Amabel.

"Hum!" exclaimed the King, exchanging a look with Rochester.

"For pity, sire, do not hesitate," cried Amabel, in a tone of such agony that the good-natured monarch could not resist it.

"Well, well," he rejoined; "it shall be as you desire. Rochester, you have heard our promise and will act in conformity with it."

The Earl bowed carelessly.

"Nay, nay, my lord," pursued Charles authoritatively, "my commands shall be obeyed, and if you purpose otherwise I will place you under restraint."

"Your Majesty's wishes are sufficient restraint," rejoined Rochester; "I am all obedience."

"It is well," replied Charles. "Are you satisfied, fair damsel?"

"Perfectly," replied Amabel. And making a profound and grateful reverence to the King, she retired.

Nizza Macasree met her at the door, and it was well she did so, or Amabel, whose strength began to fail her, would otherwise have fallen. While she was thus engaged, Charles caught sight of the piper's daughter, and being greatly struck by her beauty, inquired her name.

"Oddsfish!" he exclaimed, when informed of it by Rochester, "a piper's daughter! She is far more beautiful than your mistress."

"If I procure her for your Majesty, will you withdraw your interdiction from me?" rejoined the Earl.

"No—no—that is impossible, after the pledge I have given," replied Charles. "But you must bring this lovely creature to me anon. I am enchanted with her, and do not regret this long ride, since it has brought her under my notice."

"Your Majesty's wishes shall be obeyed," said Rochester. "I will not wait till to-morrow for an interview with Amabel," he added to himself.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

HOW BLAIZE AND PILLICHODY CRACKED A BOTTLE TOGETHER.

SUPPORTED by Nizza Macascree and her aunt, and followed by Leonard, Amabel contrived to reach her own chamber, and as soon as she was sufficiently recovered from the agitation into which she had been thrown, detailed to them all that had passed in her interview with the King. While the party were consulting together as to the course to be pursued in this emergency, the tap of a wand was heard at the door, and the summons being answered by Mrs. Buscot, she found one of the ushers without, who informed her that it was the King's pleasure that no one should leave the house till the following day without his permission.

"To ensure obedience to his orders," continued the usher, "his Majesty requires that the keys of the stable be delivered to the keeping of his chief page, Mr. Chiffinch, who has orders, together with myself, to keep watch during the night."

So saying, he bowed and withdrew, while Mrs. Buscot returned with this new and alarming piece of intelligence to the others.

"Why should the mandate be respected?" cried Leonard, indignantly. "We have committed no crime, and ought not to be detained prisoners. Trust to me, and I will find some means of eluding the vigilance of the watchers. If you remain here till to-morrow," he added to Amabel, "you are lost."

"Do not expect any rational advice from me, my dear niece," observed Mrs. Buscot. "I am fairly bewildered."

"I shall not forfeit the King's protection by disobeying his injunctions," replied Amabel. "I am safer here than if I were to seek a new asylum, which would be speedily discovered."

"Heaven grant you may not have cause to repent your determination!" cried Leonard, despondingly.

"I must now, perforce, quit you, my dear niece," said Mrs. Buscot, "though it breaks my heart to do so. His Majesty's arrival has thrown everything into confusion, and if I do not look after the supper, which is commanded at an early hour, it will never be ready.

As it is, there will be nothing fit to set before him. What with my distress about you, and my anxiety about the royal repast, I am well-nigh distracted."

With this, she quitted the room, and Amabel signifying to Leonard that she desired to be left alone with Nizza Macascree, he departed at the same time.

As Mrs. Buscot had stated, the utmost confusion prevailed below. The royal purveyor, and cook, who formed part of the King's suite, were busily employed in the kitchen, and though they had the whole household at their command, they made rather slow progress at first, owing to the want of materials to work upon. In a short time, however, this difficulty was remedied. Fowls and ducks were slaughtered by the dozen, and a couple of fat geese were added to the bill of fare. The store-ponds were visited for fish by John Lutcombe; and as the country abounded with game, a large supply of pheasants, partridges, and rabbits, was speedily procured by the keeper and his assistants. Amongst others, Blaize was required to lend a helping hand; and he had just commenced plucking one of the geese, when he was aroused by a slap on the shoulder, and looking up, beheld Pillichody.

"What ho! my little Blaize, my physic-taking porter," cried the bully, "how wags the world with you? And how is my pretty Patience? How is that peerless kitchen-maiden? By the god of love! I am burning with impatience to behold her again."

"Patience is well enough for aught I know," replied Blaize, in a surly tone. "But it is useless for you to think of her. She is betrothed to me."

"I know it," replied Pillichody; "but do not suppose you are the sole master of her affections. The little charmer has too good taste for that. 'Blaize,' said she, 'will do very well for a husband, but he cannot expect me to continue faithful to him.'"

"Cannot I!" exclaimed the porter, reddening. "Fiends take her! but I do! When did she say this to you?"

"When I last visited your master's house," replied Pillichody. "Sweet soul! I shall never forget her tender looks at me, nor the kisses she allowed me to snatch from her honeyed lips when your back was turned. The very recollection of them is delicious."

"Infamous liar and traducer!" cried Blaize, transported with fury. "If I am only a porter, while you pretend to be a major, I will let you see I am the better man of the two." And taking the goose by the neck, he swung it round his head like a flail, and began to batter Pillichody about the face with it.

"Sdeath!" cried the bully, endeavouring to draw his sword; "if you do not instantly desist, I will treat you like a goose yourself,—I will cut your throat, pluck, stuff, roast, and eat you afterwards." He was, however, so bewildered by the attack that he could offer no resistance, and in retreating, caught his foot against the leg of a table, and fell backwards on the floor. Being now completely at the porter's mercy, and seeing that the latter was preparing to pursue his advantage with a rolling-pin which he had snatched from the dresser, he besought him piteously to spare him.

"Recant all you have said," cried Blaize, brandishing the rolling-pin over him. "Confess that you have calumniated Patience. Confess that she rejected you, if you ever dared to make advances to her. Confess that she is a model of purity and constancy. Confess all this, you libellous villain, or I will break every bone in your body."

"I confess it," replied Pillichody, abjectly. "She is all you describe. She never allowed me greater freedom than a squeeze of the hand."

"That is false," replied the porter, belabouring him with the rolling-pin. "I am certain she never allowed it. Swear that you will never attempt such a liberty again, or I will pummel you to death. Swear it."

"I do," replied Pillichody.

"Before I suffer you to rise, I must disarm you to prevent mischief," cried Blaize. And kneeling upon the prostrate bully, who groaned aloud, he drew his long blade from his side. "There, now you may get up," he added.

So elated was Blaize with his conquest, that he could do nothing for some time but strut up and down the kitchen with the sword over his shoulder, to the infinite diversion of the other domestics, and especially of John Lutcombe, who chanced to make his appearance at the time, laden with a fresh supply of game.

"Why, Blaize, man," cried the keeper, approvingly, "I did not give thee credit for half so much spirit."

"No man knows the extent of his valour till he has approved it," rejoined Blaize. "I would combat with a giant like you, stalwart John, if Patience's fidelity were called in question."

Pillichody, meanwhile, had retired with a discomfited air into one corner of the kitchen, where he seated himself on a stool, and eyed the porter askance, as if he meditated some terrible retaliation. Secretly apprehensive of this, and thinking it would be becoming to act with magnanimity towards his foe, Blaize marched up to him, and extended his hand in token of reconciliation. To the surprise of all, Pillichody did not reject his friendly overtures.

"I have a great regard for you, friend Blaize," he said, "otherwise I should never rest satisfied till I had been repaid, with terrible interest, for the indignities I have endured."

"Nay, heed them not," replied Blaize. "You must make allowance for the jealous feelings you excited. I love Patience better than my life."

"Since you put the matter in that light," rejoined Pillichody, "I am willing to overlook it. Snakes and scorpions! no man can be a greater martyr to jealousy than I have been. I killed three of my most intimate friends for merely presuming to ogle the widow of Watling-street, who would have been mine, if she had not died of the plague."

"Don't talk of the plague, I beseech you," replied Blaize, with a shudder. "It is a subject never mentioned here."

"I am sorry I alluded to it then," rejoined Pillichody. "Give me back my sword. Nay, fear nothing. I have entirely forgiven you, and am willing to drown the remembrance of our quarrel in a bottle of sack."

Readily assenting to the proposition, Blaize obtained the key of the cellar from the butler, and adjourning thither with Pillichody, they seated themselves on a cask with a bottle of sack and a couple of large glasses on a stool between them.

"I suppose you know why we are come hither?" observed the Major, smacking his lips after his second bumper.

"Not precisely," replied Blaize. "But I presume your visit has some reference to Mistress Amabel."

"A shrewd guess," rejoined Pillichody, "And this reminds me that we have omitted to drink her health."

"Her better health," returned Blaize, emptying his glass. "Heaven be praised! she looks a little better since we came here."

"She would soon be herself again if she were united to the Earl of Rochester," remarked Pillichody.

"There you are wrong," replied Blaize. "She declares she has no longer any regard for him."

"Mere caprice, believe me," rejoined Pillichody. "She loves him better than ever."

"It may be so," returned Blaize; "for Patience, who ought to know something of the matter, assured me she was dying for the Earl. And if she had not told me the contrary herself, I should have been satisfied that such was the case."

"Did she say so alone, or in the presence of Leonard?" asked Pillichody.

"Why, now I bethink me, Leonard was present," replied Blaize, involuntarily putting his hand to his shoulder, as he recalled the horsewhipping he had received.

"I knew it!" cried Pillichody. "She is afraid to confess her attachment to the Earl. Is Leonard as much devoted to her as ever?"

"I fancy so," replied Blaize. "But she certainly gives him no encouragement."

"Another confirmation of my opinion," exclaimed Pillichody. "But fill your glass. We will drink to the Earl's speedy union with Amabel."

"Not so loud," cried Blaize, looking uneasily round the cellar. "I should not like Leonard to overhear us."

"Neither should I," returned Pillichody, "for I have something to say to you respecting him."

"You may spare yourself the trouble of proposing any more plans for carrying off Amabel," cried Blaize, "for I won't take any part in them."

"I have no such intention," rejoined Pillichody. The truth is," he added mysteriously, "I am inclined to side with you and Leonard. But as we have finished our bottle, suppose we take a turn in the court yard."

"With all my heart," replied Blaize.

Immediately after Amabel's departure, Charles proceeded with his courtiers to the garden, and continued to saunter up and down the terrace for some time, during which he engaged Rochester in conversation, so as to give him no pretext for absenting himself. The King next ascended to the belvedere, and having surveyed the prospect from it, was about to descend, when he caught a glimpse of Nizza Macisree on the great staircase, and instantly flew towards her.

"I must have a word with you, sweetheart," he cried, taking her hand, which she did not dare to refuse.

Ready to sink with confusion, Nizza suffered herself to be led towards the receiving-room. Motioning the courtiers to remain without, Charles entered it with his blushing companion, and after putting several questions to her, which she answered with great timidity and modesty, inquired into the state of her heart.

"Answer me frankly," he said. "Are your affections engaged?"

"Since your Majesty deigns to interest yourself so much about me," replied Nizza, "I will use no disguise. They are."

"To whom?" demanded the King.

"To Leonard Holt," replied Nizza.

"What! the apprentice who brought Amabel hither?" cried the King. "Why, the Earl of Rochester seemed to intimate that he was in love with Amabel. Is it so?"

"I cannot deny it," replied Nizza, blushing deeply.

"If this is the case, it is incumbent on me to provide you with a new lover," replied Charles. "What will you say, sweetheart, if I tell you you have made a conquest of myself?"

"I should tremble to hear it," replied Nizza. But I trust your Majesty is jesting with me."

"On my soul, no," rejoined the King, passionately. "I have never seen beauty equal to yours, sweetheart, —never have been so suddenly—so completely captivated before."

"Oh! do not use this language towards me, my liege," replied Nizza, falling on her knee before him. "I am unworthy your notice. My heart is entirely given to Leonard Holt."

"You will speedily forget him in the brilliant destiny which awaits you, child," returned Charles, raising her. "Do not bestow another thought on the senseless dolt who can prefer Amabel's sickly charms to your piquant attractions. By heaven! you shall be mine."

"Never!" exclaimed Nizza, extricating herself from his grasp, and rushing towards the door.

"You fly in vain," cried the King, laughingly. "You will be instantly brought back."

As the words were uttered, the door opened, and Sir Paul Parravicin entered the room. The knight started on seeing how matters stood, and the King looked surprised and angry. Taking advantage of their confusion, Nizza made good her retreat, and hurried to Amabel's chamber, the door of which she closed and bolted.

"What is the matter?" cried Amabel, perceiving her agitation.

"Sir Paul Parravicin is here," replied Nizza. "I have seen him. But that is not all. I am unlucky enough to have attracted the King's fancy. He has terrified me with his proposals."

"Our persecution is never to end," rejoined Amabel; "you are as unfortunate as myself."

"And there is no possibility of escape," returned Nizza, bursting into tears.

"You can fly with Leonard, if you choose," replied Amabel.

"And leave you—impossible!" rejoined Nizza.

"There is nothing for it, then, but resignation," returned Amabel. "Let us put our firm trust in Heaven, and no ill can befall us."

After passing several hours of the greatest disquietude, they were about to retire to rest, when Mrs. Buscot tapped at the door, and making herself known, was instantly admitted.

"Alas!" she cried, clasping her arms around her niece's neck. "I tremble to tell you what I have heard. Despite the King's injunctions, the Earl of Rochester is determined to see you before the morning, and to force you to compliance with his wishes. You must fly as soon as it grows dark enough for you to escape unobserved."

"But how am I to fly, dear aunt?" rejoined Amabel. "You yourself knew that the keys of the stable are taken away, and that two of the King's attendants will remain on the watch all night."

"Leave Leonard to manage it all," replied Mrs. Buscot. "Only prepare to set out. John Lutcombe will guide you across the downs to Kingston Lisle, and when the danger is over, you can return to me."

"It is a hazardous expedient," rejoined Amabel, "and I would rather run all risks, and remain where I am. If the Earl should resort to violence, I can appeal to the King for protection."

"If you have any regard for me, fly," cried Nizza Macasree. "I am lost if I remain here till to-morrow."

"For your sake I will go, then," returned Amabel. "But I have a presentiment that I am running into the face of danger."

"Oh! say not so," rejoined Mrs. Buscot. "I am persuaded it is for the best. I must leave you now, but I will send Leonard to you."

"It is needless," replied Amabel. "Let him come to us at the proper time. We will be ready."

To explain the cause of Mrs. Buscot's alarm, it will be necessary to return to the receiving room, and see what occurred after Amabel's flight. Charles, who at first had been greatly annoyed by Parravicin's abrupt entrance, speedily recovered his temper.

"I find I have a rival in your Majesty," observed the Knight. "It is unlucky for me that you have encountered Nizza. Her charms were certain to inflame you. But when I tell you I am still desperately enamoured of her, I am persuaded you will not interfere with me."

"I will tell you what I will do," replied the good-humoured monarch, after a moment's reflection. "I remember you mentioned that you once played with a Captain Disbrowe for his wife, and won her from him. We will play in the same manner for this girl."

"But your Majesty is a more skilful player than Disbrowe," replied Parravicin, reluctantly.

"It matters not," rejoined the monarch; "the chances will be more equal—or rather the advantage will be greatly on your side, for you are allowed to be the luckiest and best player at my court. If I win, she is mine. If, on the contrary, fortune favours you I resign her."

"Since there is no avoiding it, I accept the challenge," replied Parravicin.

"The decision shall not be delayed an instant," said Charles, "What, ho!—dice!—dice!"

An attendant answering the summons, he desired him to bring a dice-box; but the order could not be so easily obeyed, there being no such article at Ash-down, when Pillichody chancing to overhear what was going forward, produced a box and dice, which were instantly conveyed to the King, and as by this time the courtiers were assembled, the play commenced. Charles, to his inexpressible delight, and Parravicin's chagrin, came off the winner, and the mortification of the latter was increased by the laughter and taunts of the courtiers.

"You are not in your usual luck to-day," observed Rochester to him, as they walked aside.

"Think not I will surrender Nizza," said Parravicin, in a low tone, "I love her too well for that."

"I cannot blame you," replied Rochester. "Step this way. It is my intention to carry off Amabel to-night," he continued lowering his voice, "notwithstanding old Rowley's injunctions to the contrary, and I propose to accomplish my purpose in the following manner. I will frighten her into flying with Leonard Holt, and will then secretly follow her. Nizza Macasree is sure to accompany her, and will, therefore, be in your power."

"I see!" cried Parravicin. "A capital project!"

"Pillichody has contrived to scrape an intimacy with Blaize," pursued the Earl, "and through him the matter can be easily managed. The keys of the stable, which are now entrusted to Chiffinch, shall be stolen—the horses set free—and the two damsels caught in the trap prepared for them, while the only person blamed in the matter will be Leonard."

"Bravo!" exclaimed Parravicin. "I am impatient for the scheme to be put into execution."

"I will set about it at once," returned Rochester.

So saying, he formed some excuse for quitting the royal presence.

About an hour after this, Pillichody sought out Blaize, and told him, with a very mysterious air, that he had something to confide to him.

"You know my regard for the Earl of Rochester and Sir Paul Parravicin," he said, "and that I would do anything that an honourable man can do to assist them. But I cannot further their views in a certain way. It is their intention to obtain an interview—by force if need be—before day-break, with Amabel and Nizza Macasree, and I therefore give you notice that you may acquaint Leonard Holt, and contrive their escape in the early part of the night. I will steal the keys of the stable for you from Chiffinch, and will render you every assistance in my power. But if you are discovered, you must not betray me."

"Not for the world!" replied Blaize. "I am sure we are infinitely obliged to you. It is a horrible design, and must be prevented. I wish all this flying and escaping was over. I desire to be quiet, and am quite sorry to leave this charming place."

"There is no alternative now," rejoined Pillichody.

"So it appears," groaned Blaize.

The substance of Pillichody's communication was immediately conveyed to Leonard, who told Blaize to acquaint his informer that he should have two pieces of gold, if he brought them the keys. To obtain them was not very difficult, and the bully was aided in the task by the Earl of Rochester. Chiffinch was a great drinker, and this the Earl well knew. Acquainting Pillichody with his design, he went into the hall, where the page was stationed, and after a little conversation with him, called for a glass of wine. It was brought, and while they were quaffing bumpers, Pillichody contrived, without being observed, to open a table-drawer in which the keys were placed, and to slip them noiselessly into his doublet. He then stole away, and Rochester, who had a further design upon the watchfulness of the page, pressed glass after glass upon him, and experienced no very determined resistance on his part. A few minutes after this, the keys were delivered to Blaize by Pillichody, who received in return the proposed reward, chuckling to himself at the success of his roguery. The porter conveyed them to Leonard, and the latter handed them in his turn to John Lutcombe, who engaged to have the horses at the lower end of the south avenue an hour before midnight.

CHAPTER XXXV.

KINGSTON LISLE.

ABOUT half-past ten, and when it was supposed that the King and his courtiers had retired to rest (for people kept early hours in those days), Mrs. Buscot and Leonard repaired to Amabel's chamber. The former noticed, with great uneasiness, that her niece looked excessively pale and agitated, and she would have persuaded her to abandon all idea of flight, if she had not feared that her stay might be attended with still worse consequences. The good housekeeper, indeed, was fairly perplexed, and scarcely knew what to do for the best. Now one plan occurred to her, now another, till at last she determined to let things take their course.

Before the party set out, Mrs. Buscot crept down stairs to see that all was safe, and returned in a few minutes, with the very satisfactory intelligence that Chiffinch was fast asleep, and snoring, in a chair in the hall, and that the usher had probably retired to rest, as he was nowhere to be seen. Not a moment, therefore, was to be lost, and quitting the room, they descended the great staircase as noiselessly as possible. So far all had gone well; but on gaining the hall, Amabel's strength completely deserted her, and if Leonard had not caught her in his arms, she would have fallen. He was hurrying forward with his burthen, towards a passage at the side, when Chiffinch, who had been disturbed by the noise, started to his feet, and commanded him to stop. At this moment, and when the fugitives were completely confounded, a figure enveloped in a cloak suddenly darted from behind a door, and extinguishing the lamp which Chiffinch had taken from the table, seized him with a powerful grasp. All was now buried in darkness, and while Leonard was hesitating what to do, he felt his hand grasped, and heard a voice, which he knew to be that of Pillichody, whisper in his ear, "Come with me—I will secure your retreat—this way—this way."

Suffering himself to be drawn along, and closely followed by Nizza Macascree and Mrs. Buscot, he crossed the dining-chamber, not without stumbling against some of the furniture and upsetting it by the way, and passed through an open window into the court. Here he found Blaize awaiting them, and Pillichody, without tarrying for thanks, disappeared, while Mrs. Buscot, having pointed out the course they ought to pursue, bade them farewell.

Hurrying across the court, they reached the south avenue, but had not proceeded far when it became evident, from the lights at the windows, as well as from the shouts and other noises resounding from the court, that their flight was discovered. Encumbered by his lovely burthen, Leonard ran as swiftly as he could, and Nizza Macascree and Blaize kept near him. They found John Lutcombe at the end of the avenue with the horses, and mounting them, set off along the Downs, accompanied by the keeper, who acted as their guide. Striking off on the right, they came to a spot of ground covered with immense grey stones, almost resembling those rocky masses used by the Druids in the construction of a cromlech, and, as it was quite dark, it required some caution to pass safely through them. Guided by the keeper, who here took hold of his bridle, Leonard was soon out of harm's way, but Blaize was not so fortunate. Alarmed by the idea of pursuit, and not attending to the keeper's caution, he urged his horse on, and the animal, stumbling against a stone, precipitated him and Nizza Macascree to the ground. Luckily, neither of them fell against the flinty mass, or the consequences might have been fatal. John Lutcombe instantly flew to their assistance, but before he reached them, Nizza Macascree had regained her feet. Blaize, however, who was considerably shaken and bruised by the fall, was not quite so expeditious, and his dilatoriness so provoked the keeper, that, seizing him in his arms, he lifted him into the saddle. Scarcely, however, was Nizza Macascree placed on the pillion behind him, than the tramp of horses was heard rapidly approaching them. Before they had proceeded a hundred yards, their pursuers overtook them, and the foremost, whose tones proclaimed him to be the Earl of Rochester, commanded them to stop. Inexpressibly alarmed, Amabel could not repress a scream, and guided by the sound, the Earl dashed to her side, and seized the bridle of her steed.

A furious struggle took place, in which Leonard strove to break from the Earl's hold, and might have succeeded, if the latter had not drawn his sword and held it to the apprentice's throat.

"Deliver up your mistress to me, instantly, villain," he cried, in a menacing tone, "or you are a dead man."

"Never!" cried Leonard, renewing his struggles.

"Hold!" exclaimed Amabel, springing from the horse. "I will not be the cause of bloodshed. I implore you, my lord, to desist from this outrage. You will gain nothing by it but my death."

"Let him touch you at his peril," cried John Lutcombe, rushing towards them, and placing his stalwart person between her and the Earl.

"Stand aside, villain!" cried Rochester, furiously,— "or I will trample you beneath my horse's hoofs."

"You must first get near me to do it, my lord," rejoined the keeper.

And as he spoke, he struck the Earl's horse so violent a blow with a stout oaken cudgel which he held in his hand, that the animal became unmanageable, and dashed across the Downs to some distance with his rider.

Meanwhile, Parravicin, having ridden up with Pillichody (for they, it appeared, were the Earl's companions), attacked Blaize, and commanded him to deliver up Nizza Macascree. Scared almost out of his senses, the porter would have instantly complied, if the piper's daughter had not kept fast hold of him, and, reproaching him with his cowardice, screamed loudly for help. Heedless of her cries, Parravicin seized her, and strove to drag her from the horse. But she only clung the closer to Blaize; and the latter, expecting every moment to pay another visit to the ground, added his vociferations for assistance to hers.

"Leave go your hold," he cried to Pillichody, who had seized him on the other side by the collar. "Leave go, I say, or you will rend my jerkin asunder. What are you doing here? I thought you were to help us to escape."

"So I have done," rejoined Pillichody, bursting into a loud laugh, "and I am now helping to catch you again. What a blind buzzard you must be not to have perceived the net that was spread for you. Deliver up Nizza Macascree without more ado, or, by all the fiends, I will pay you off for your dastardly assault upon me this morning."

"I cannot deliver her up," cried Blaize,— "she sticks to me as fast as a leech. I shall be torn asunder between you. Help, help!"

These exclamations were scarcely uttered, when Parravicin, who had dismounted, tore away Nizza Macascree, and was just about to transfer her to his own steed, when John Lutcombe, having driven away the Earl in the manner above related, now came to the rescue. One blow of his cudgel stretched Parravicin on the sod, and liberated Nizza Macascree, who instantly flew to the keeper for protection. Finding how matters stood, and that he was likely to be well backed, Blaize plucked up his courage, and grappled with Pillichody. In the struggle, they both tumbled to the ground. The keeper rushed towards them, and, seizing Pillichody, began to belabour him soundly with his cudgel. In vain the bully supplicated for mercy. He underwent a severe chastisement, and Blaize added a few thumps to the shower of blows proceeding from the keeper, crying, as he dealt them, "Who is the buzzard now, I should like to know!"

By this time, Parravicin had regained his legs, and the Earl of Rochester having forced back his steed, both drew their swords, and prepared to renew the charge, and the affair might have assumed a serious aspect, if it had not chanced that just at this juncture lights were seen hurrying along the avenue, from which, next moment, a large party of persons issued.

"It is the King!" cried Rochester. "What is to be done?"

"Our prey must be abandoned," rejoined Parravicin. "It will never do to be caught here."

With this, he sprang upon his steed, and disappeared across the downs with the Earl.

John Lutcombe, on perceiving the approach of the torch-bearers, instantly abandoned Pillichody, and assisting Blaize to the saddle, placed Nizza behind him. Leonard likewise, who had dismounted to support Amabel, replaced her in the pillion, and in a few seconds the party set forward again. The bully, however, did not care to be left behind, but snatching the bridle of his steed, which was quietly grazing at a little distance, mounted him, and galloped off in the direction which he fancied had been taken by the Earl and his companion.

Guided by the keeper, who ran beside them, the party proceeded for a couple of miles at a rapid pace over the Downs, when, as it did not appear they were followed, John Lutcombe paused for a short time to recover breath. The fresh air had in some degree revived Amabel, and the circumstance of their providential deliverance raised the spirits of the whole party. Soon after this, they reached the ridge of the Downs, the magnificent view from which was completely hidden by the shades of night, and tracking the old Roman road for about a mile, descended the steep hill side in the direction of the Blowing Stone. Skirting a thick grove of trees, they presently came to a gate, which the keeper opened, and led them through an orchard towards what appeared to be, in the gloom, a moderately sized and comfortable dwelling.

"The owner of this house, Mrs. Compton," observed

John Lutcombe to Amabel, "is a widow, and the kindest-hearted lady in Berkshire. A message has been sent to her by your aunt, to beg her to afford you an asylum for a few days, and I will answer for it you will be hospitably received."

As he spoke, the loud barking of a dog was heard, and an old grey-headed butler was seen advancing towards them with a lantern in his hand. At the same time, a groom issued from the stable on the right, preceded by the dog in question, and hastening towards them, assisted them to dismount. The dog seemed to recognize the keeper, and leaping towards him, licked his hand.

"What, Maud, lass," cried the keeper, patting her head, "dost thou know thy old master again? I see you have taken good care of her, Sam," he added to the groom. "I knew I was placing her in good hands when I gave her to Mrs. Compton."

"Ay, ay, she can't find a better home, I fancy," said the groom.

"And now, ladies," said the old butler to Amabel and Nizza, "will it please you to walk this way. My mistress has been expecting you for some time, and will be glad to see you." So saying, he conducted them through a garden, the flowers within which exhaled the most delicious odours, and ushered them into the house.

They found Mrs. Compton, who was an elderly lady, of very pleasing exterior, and who received them with great kindness, in an elegant room, surrounded with bookshelves and old family portraits, where refreshments were spread out for them. The good old lady seemed particularly interested in Amabel, and pressed her to partake of the refreshments, but in vain. With extreme delicacy, she refrained from inquiring into the reason of their visit, and finding that both her guests appeared much fatigued, would not detain them longer from rest. Amabel was delighted with her kind hostess, and, contrary to her expectations, and to those of Nizza Macascree, enjoyed an excellent night's repose. She awoke in the morning greatly refreshed, and after attiring herself, gazed through her chamber window. It looked upon a trim and beautiful garden, with a grass plat carved out into numerous little beds, filled with the choicest flowers, and surrounded by fine timber, amid which a magnificent fir-tree shot up to a great height. Mrs. Compton, who always arose with the sun, was busied in tending her flowers, and as Amabel watched her interesting pursuits, she could scarcely help envying her.

"What a delightful life your mistress must lead," she observed to a female attendant, who was present.

"I cannot imagine a mode of existence more conducive to happiness than that she seems to pursue."

"My mistress ought to be happy," replied the attendant, "for there is no one who does more good. Not a cottage nor a farm-house in the neighbourhood but she visits, to inquire whether she can be of any service to its inmate, and wherever her services are required, they are always rendered. Mrs. Compton's name will never be forgotten in Kingston Lisle."

"It never ought to be," replied Amabel.

At this moment, she caught sight of the benevolent countenance of Mrs. Compton looking up at the window, and a kindly greeting passed between them. Maud, who was a privileged intruder, was gambolling about the garden, and though her mistress watched her sportive movements around her favourite flowerbeds with some anxiety, she did not like to check her. Amabel and Nizza now went down stairs, and Mrs. Compton returning from the garden, all the household, including Leonard and Blaize, assembled in the breakfast-room to morning prayers.

Breakfast over, Mrs. Compton, who, it has been already stated, took a strong interest in Amabel, entered into conversation with her, and ascertained all the particulars of her history. She was greatly interested in it, but could not conceal from her the anxiety which she felt as to her informant's present position.

"Your's is really a very singular situation," she said, "and I should be acting unfairly towards you, if I were not to tell you that I think you are still in great peril. However, I will give you all the protection in my power, and I trust your retreat may not be discovered."

Mrs. Compton's remark did not tend to dispel Amabel's uneasiness, and both she and Nizza Macascree passed a day of great disquietude and alarm.

In the mean time, Leonard and Blaize had been treated with the greatest hospitality by the old butler; and though the former was not without apprehension that their retreat might be discovered, he trusted, if it were so, that fortune would still favour their escape. He did not dare to confide to the butler the cause of his misgiving, nor did the other make any inquiries, but every precaution was taken to keep their visit secret. John Lutcombe had tarried no longer than enabled him to discuss a jug of ale, and having promised Leonard to come again on the following day to report what was done at Ashdown Lodge, set out on his return. He had not, however, made his appearance as yet.

Evening had now arrived, and nothing having been seen of any of their enemies, all became comparatively easy; and Mrs. Compton herself, who had looked unusually grave throughout the day, now recovered her wonted cheerfulness.

Their satisfaction, however, was speedily disturbed by the arrival of a company of horsemen at the head of the orchard, and a stately personage, at the head of a gallant train, walked towards the door of the house. At the sight of the new comers, whom they instantly discovered to be the King and his suite, Amabel and Nizza Macascree fled to their own chamber, and awaited what was to follow in the utmost trepidation. They were not kept long in suspense.

Shortly after the King's arrival, Mrs. Compton entered their chamber, and, with a countenance of much anxiety, informed Amabel that his Majesty desired to see her. Knowing that refusal was impossible, Amabel complied, and descended to a room looking upon the garden, in which she found the King. Charles received her with a somewhat severe aspect, and demanded why she had left Ashdown, contrary to his express injunctions?

Amabel stated her motives.

"What you tell me is by no means satisfactory," rejoined the King; "but since you have chosen to trust to yourself, you must no longer look for assistance from me."

"I trust your Majesty will consider the dreadful strait into which I was driven," replied Amabel.

"You have entirely forfeited my protection," returned Charles; "and I consider myself fully exonerated from whatever may ensue. What ho! Chiffinch Summon the Earl of Rochester to our presence."

"In pity, sire," cried Amabel.

"Let the injunction be obeyed," rejoined Charles.

And Chiffinch departed.

Amabel, who had thrown herself on her knees before the King, immediately arose, and drew herself up to her full height. Rochester soon afterwards made his appearance with the page, and on seeing Amabel, a flush of triumphant joy overspread his features.

"I withdraw my interdiction," said the King to him; "you are at liberty to renew your suit to this damsel."

"Is it in vain to appeal to your Majesty further?" demanded Amabel.

Charles averted his head.

"Hear me, then, Lord Rochester," she continued, turning to the Earl, and regarding him with a cold look. "I have conquered the passion I once felt for you. I regard you only as one who has sought my ruin, and from whom I have fortunately escaped. When you learn from my own lips that my heart is dead to you, and that I only desire to be freed from your addresses, surely you will discontinue them."

"Your declaration only increases my passion for you, lovely Amabel," replied the Earl, "I will never desist till I make you mine."

"Then my death will rest at your door," rejoined Amabel.

"I will take my chance of it," rejoined the Earl, carelessly.

Amabel then quitted the King's presence, and returned to her own chamber, in a state of indescribable agitation.

"All has happened that I anticipated," she said to Nizza Macascree. "The King will no longer protect me, and I am exposed to the persecutions of the Earl of Rochester, who is here."

As she spoke, an usher entered, and informed Nizza Macascree that the King commanded her presence. The piper's daughter looked at Amabel with a glance of unutterable anguish.

"I fear you must go," said Amabel, "but Heaven will protect you."

And tenderly embracing her, Nizza departed with the usher.

Some time having elapsed, and the piper's daughter not returning, Amabel became seriously uneasy. Hearing a noise below she looked forth from her window; she perceived the King and his train departing, and a terrible foreboding shot through her heart. Overcome at last by her anxiety, she rushed down stairs, and had just reached the last step when she was seized by two persons—a shawl was passed over her head, and she was forced out of the house.

BOOK THE FOURTH.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

THE HEIGHT OF THE PESTILENCE.

AMABEL's departure for Berkshire caused no change in her father's mode of life. Everything proceeded as before within his dwelling; nor was the rigid system of discipline with which he had commenced in the slightest degree relaxed. The result proved that he had judged correctly. While the scourge increased in malignancy and fury and spread its ravages throughout the city, all his family continued in perfect health.

For some weeks after her separation from her daughter, Mrs. Bloundel continued in a desponding state; but after that time she gradually recovered her cheerfulness, and began to hope that she would be restored to her in amended health. Mr. Bloundel scarcely dared to indulge such an expectation, but though he suffered much in secret, he never allowed his grief to manifest itself. The circumstance that he had not received any intelligence of Amabel did not weigh much with him, because the difficulty of communication became greater and greater, as each week the scourge increased in violence, and he was inclined to take no news as good news. It was not so, however, in the present case; but of this he was happily ignorant. Often and often, as he sat with his wife in an evening, their discourse would turn upon their absent child, and they would fondly picture her with Mrs. Buscot, restored to bloom and beauty, and only waiting the disappearance of the pestilence to return to them.

On one occasion, Mrs. Bloundel could not help expressing her surprise that nothing was heard of Leonard or Blaize, but the grocer checked her by saying that the apprentice was no doubt deterred by the frightful state of the city, of which he must necessarily hear, from venturing near them. "And now, as you well know," he added, "he has an additional motive for staying away. As to Blaize, I never expected him to return."

In this opinion Mrs. Bloundel concurred, and, after various surmises, she satisfied herself that all was going satisfactorily in Berkshire. The rest of the family shared in these anxieties, and little Christiana would often weep for her sister, declaring she was certain she should never see her again. In the kitchen, too, equal regrets were expressed, and Patience was not unfrequently found in tears by old Josyna—whether for Amabel or Blaize she could not precisely ascertain.

In this way, a month passed on. And now every other consideration became absorbed in the alarm occasioned by the daily-increasing fury of the scourge. Throughout July the excessive heat of the weather had undergone no abatement. Blights filled the heavy air, and confining the pestilential effluvia, spread the contagion far and wide with extraordinary rapidity. Not only was the city suffocated with heat, but filled with noisome smells, arising from the numberless carcases with which close alleys and other out of the way places were crowded, and which were in a state of decomposition that did not admit of removal.

The aspect of the river was as much changed at this terrible season as that of the city whose walls it washed. Numbers of bodies were thrown into it, and floating up with the tides, were left to taint the air on its banks, while strange ill-omened fowl, attracted thither by their instinct, preyed upon them undisturbed. Below the bridge, all captains of ships moored in the Pool or off Wapping, held as little communication as possible with persons on shore, and only received fresh provisions with the greatest precaution. As the plague increased, most of these removed lower down the river, and many of them put out entirely to sea. Above the bridge, the whole of the wherries and other small craft had disappeared. Their owners had taken them up the river, and mooring them against its banks at different spots, lived in them under tilts, procuring provisions from the different farm-houses. Many hundreds remained upon the water in this way during the whole continuance of the visitation, the greater part of whom escaped it altogether.

August had now arrived, but the plague knew no cessation. On the contrary, it manifestly increased in violence and malignancy. Not only were the deaths more frequent, but the progress of the distemper was more rapid, and accompanied with more dreadful symptoms than heretofore. During the whole of this fatal month the heat was so oppressive, that no one stirred forth during the middle of the day, and the fear of contagion was so great that few stirred forth at all. But the immediate presence of death produced no beneficial change in the public morals. The utmost licentiousness continued to prevail, and one-half of the victims of the scourge perished in their sin, while the survivors appeared entirely unmoved by their fate. It is a sad reflection that such has been invariably the case in every infected city. It was so in the great plagues of Athens and Syracuse, and in recent times in that of Marseilles. Recklessness and depravity seem to have gone hand in hand with the scourge, and the miserable wretches, bent upon a moment's enjoyment, appear to have forgotten the dreadful pit yawning at their feet.

By this time, the mortality had frightfully increased. The deaths rose a thousand a week, and in the last week in August, they amounted to upwards of six thousand! "Now," says Vincent, "the cloud is very black, and the storm comes down upon us very sharp. Now Death rides triumphantly on his pale horse through our streets, and breaks into every house where any inhabitants are to be found. Now people fall as thick as leaves from the trees in autumn, when they are shaken by a mighty wind. Now there is a dismal solitude in the streets. Every day looks with the face of a Sabbath-day, observed with greater solemnity than it used to be in the city. Now shops are shut up, people rare and very few that walk about, insomuch that the grass begins to spring up in some places, and a deep silence reigns almost in every place, especially within the walls. No rattling coaches are heard, no prancing horses, no calling in customers, no offering wares, no London cries. If any sounds there be, they are the groans of dying persons breathing forth their last, and the funeral knells of those that are ready to be carried to their graves. Now the shutting up of visited houses (there being so many) is at an end, and most of the sound are mingled among the sick, who otherwise would get no help. Now, in some places where the people did generally stay, not one house in a hundred but is infected, and in many houses half the family is swept away; in some the whole, from the eldest to the youngest; while but few escape with the death of but one or two. Never did so many husbands and wives die together. Never did so many parents carry their children with them to the grave, and go together into the same house under earth who had lived together in the same house upon it. Now the nights are too short to bury the dead; the whole day (though at so great a length) being hardly sufficient to light the dead that fall therein to their beds."

But terrible as were its ravages, the pestilence had not yet reached its height. Hopes had been entertained that when the weather became cooler, its fury would be mitigated; but these anticipations were fearfully disappointed. The bills of mortality rose the first week in September to seven thousand, and though they slightly decreased during the second week,—awakening momentary hope,—on the third they advanced to twelve thousand! In less than ten days upwards of two thousand persons perished in the parish of Aldgate alone; while Whitechapel suffered equally severely. Out of the hundred parishes in and about the City, one alone—namely, Saint John the Evangelist in Watling-street,—remained uninfected; and it escaped only because there was scarcely a soul within it, the greater part of the inhabitants having quitted their houses and fled into the country.

The deepest despair now seized all those left alive in the City. Scarcely a family but had lost half its number, and those who were left felt assured that their turn would speedily arrive. Not only were the dead lying in the passages and alleys, but even in the main thoroughfares, and none would remove them. The awful prediction of Solomon Eagle, that "grass would grow in the streets, and that the living should not be able to bury the dead," had come to pass. London had become one vast lazaret house, where nothing could be seen but the dying and the dead, nothing heard but shrieks and groans. Those who had hitherto sustained themselves with courage, now yielded to despair; and no one doubted that every inhabitant of the city would be swept away. "Now," continues Vincent, "the grave doth open its mouth without measure. Multitudes! multitudes! in the valley of the shadow of death, hurrying daily into eternity. The churchyards are now stuffed so full with dead corpses, that they are in many places swelled two or three feet higher than they were before, and new ground is broken in divers places to bury the dead."

During all this time, Solomon Eagle, who had been miraculously preserved, continued to roam through the streets at night with his brasier on his head, and called on the miserable remnant of the people to repent. Nor was he altogether unsuccessful. Some few of those who heard him fell on their knees, and addressed earnest supplications to Heaven for pity.

Saint Paul's was still used as a pest-house. But it was not so crowded as heretofore, because, as scarcely one in a thousand of the infected recovered when placed under medical care, it was not thought worth while to remove them from their own dwellings. The number of attendants too had greatly diminished. Some had died, but the greater part had abandoned their offices. Neither physicians nor surgeons were spared, and Doctor Hodges was among the few of the former who escaped the distemper, and continued at his post.

Judith Malmayns, meanwhile, had been promoted to the situation of chief-nurse at the cathedral. Both she and Chowles had been attacked by the plague, and both had recovered. Judith attended the coffin-maker during his attack, and it was mainly owing to her care of him that he got through it. She never left him for a moment, and would not suffer any one to approach him—a necessary precaution, as he was so much alarmed by his situation that he would have made some awkward confessions. When Judith, in her turn, was attacked, Chowles seldom went near her, and exhibited no particular anxiety for her recovery, and indeed seemed rather disappointed at it. This want of feeling on his part greatly incensed her against him; and though he contrived in some degree to appease her, it was long before she entirely forgave him. Far from being improved by her sufferings, she returned with greater zeal than ever to her evil courses, and commenced a new career of crime. It was not necessary for her now to hasten the end of the sick. The disease did its work quickly enough; and all she sought was to obtain possession of that portion of their attire worth appropriating, and to plunder them of any money or other valuables they might possess.

To turn to the brighter side of the picture, it may be mentioned, that when the pestilence was at its height, and when no offers could induce the more timid to venture forth, or to render assistance to the sufferers, Sir John Lawrence, the Lord Mayor, the Duke of Almarle, the Earl of Craven, and the Archbishop of Canterbury devoted themselves to the care of the infected, and supplied them with every necessary they required. Among the physicians no one deserves more honourable distinction than Doctor Hodges, who was unremitting in his attentions to his numerous patients, and suffered no personal consideration to prevent him from ministering to their wants and comforts.

While the plague was thus raging around him, and while every house in the street in which he dwelt, except one or two, from which the inmates had fled, was attacked by the pestilence, the grocer and his family had remained untouched. About the middle of August, he experienced a great alarm, fearing that his second son, Hubert, was attacked, and he removed him to one of the upper rooms, which he had set aside as a hospital, and attended upon him himself.

In a few days, however, his fears were removed, and he found, to his great satisfaction, that the youth was only suffering from a slight fever. About the same time, too, he lost his porter, Dallison. The poor fellow did not make his appearance as usual in the street for two days, and the grocer's suspicions of his fate were confirmed on the following day by the appearance of his wife, who informed him that her husband had perished of the plague, and had been thrown into the plague-pit at Aldgate. The same night, however, she brought another man, named Allestry, who undertook to act in the place of the late porter, and who acquainted him with the deplorable state of the city.

"If we go on a month longer in the same way," said Allestry, "there will not be twenty souls alive within the city. People are now dying at the rate of seventeen hundred a day."

Shortly afterwards, the second porter died, and Mr. Bloundel had no one to replace him. He thus lost all means of ascertaining what was going on within the city; but the deathlike stillness that prevailed around him, broken occasionally by the hoarse tolling of a bell, by a wild shriek, or other appalling cry, proclaimed the terrible state of things.

One night, as Solomon Eagle was pursuing his course through the streets, he paused before the grocer's house, and looking up at the shutter, at which Mr. Bloundel chanced to be stationed, cried, in a loud voice, "Be of good cheer. You have served God faithfully, and the plague shall not enter into your dwelling." And raising his arms, as if invoking a blessing upon the habitation, he departed.

September had arrived, and as yet Mr. Bloundel had received no tidings of his daughter. At a less appalling season he would have been seriously uneasy; but now, with his mind engrossed by one terrible subject, he scarcely could think of her. Satisfied that she was in a healthful situation, and that her chance of preservation from the pestilence was as great, if not greater, than that of any other member of his family, he turned his thoughts entirely towards them. He redoubled his precautions, tried by every means to keep up the failing spirits of his household, and but rarely ventured to open his shutter and look forth on the external world.

On the tenth of September, which was afterwards accounted the worst day of this dreadful month, a young man of a very dejected appearance, and bearing the traces of severe suffering in his countenance, entered the west end of London, and took his way slowly towards the city. He had passed Saint Giles's, where he did not see a single living creature, nor the sign of one in any of the houses. The broad thoroughfare was completely covered with grass, and the habitations had the most melancholy and deserted air imaginable. Some doors and windows were wide open, discovering rooms with goods and furniture scattered about, having been left in this state by their inmates; but most were closely fastened up.

As he proceeded along Holborn, the ravages of the scourge were yet more apparent. Every house, on either side of the way, had a red cross, with the fatal inscription above it, upon the door. Here and there a watchman might be seen, but he looked more like a phantom than a living thing. Formerly the dead had been conveyed away at night, but now the carts went about in the day time. On reaching Saint Andrew's, Holborn, the young man saw no fewer than six hand barrows filled with corpses, scarcely covered with clothing, and revealing the blue and white stripes of the pestilence, proceeding towards a cart, which was standing near the church gates, and which was already partly loaded. The driver of the cart, a tall, cadaverous-looking man, was ringing his bell, and jesting with an assistant, whom the young man recognized, with a shudder, as the coffin-maker, Chowles. The coffin-maker recognised him at the same moment, and called to him, but the other paid no attention to the call, and passed on.

Crossing Holborn-bridge, he toiled faintly up the opposite hill, for he was evidently suffering from extreme debility, and on reaching its summit was obliged to support himself against a wall, for a few minutes, before he could proceed. The same frightful evidences of the ravages of the pestilence were observable here as elsewhere. The houses were all marked with the fatal cross, and shut up. Another dead cart was heard rumbling along, accompanied by the harsh cries of the driver, and the doleful ringing of the bell. The next moment the loathly vehicle was seen approaching along the Old Bailey. It paused before a house, from which four bodies were brought forth, and then passed on towards Smithfield. The young man watched its progress with fearful curiosity, and noted as long as it remained in sight, how often it paused to increase its load. His thoughts were coloured by the scene, and were of the saddest and dreariest complexion. All around wore the aspect of death. The few figures in sight seemed staggering towards the grave, and the houses appeared as if they would never more be inhabited. The weather was sultry and oppressive, and the air tainted with noisome exhalations. Ever and anon, a window would be opened, and a ghastly head thrust from it, while a piercing shriek, or lamentable cry, was uttered. No business seemed going on—there were no passengers—no vehicles in the streets. The mighty city was at length laid prostrate. Such were the thoughts of the young man, as he passed through Newgate, and shaped his course slowly towards Saint Paul's.

On reaching the western precincts of the cathedral, he gazed for some time at the reverend structure, as if its contemplation called up many and painful recollections. Tears started to his eyes, and he was about to turn away, when he perceived the figure of Solomon Eagle stationed near the cross terminating the roof. The enthusiast caught sight of him at the same moment, and motioned him to come nearer.

"What has happened?" he demanded, as the other approached the steps of the portico.

The young man shook his head mournfully.

"It is a sad tale," he said, "and cannot be told now."

"I can conjecture what it is," replied Solomon Eagle.

"But come to the small door near the northern entrance of the cathedral at midnight. I will meet you there."

"I will not fail," replied the young man.

"One of the terrible judgments which I predicted would befall this devoted city is come to pass," cried Solomon Eagle. "Another yet remains—the judgment by fire, and if its surviving inhabitants repent not, of which there is as yet no sign, it will assuredly follow."

"Heaven avert it!" groaned the young man, as he turned away.

Proceeding along Cheapside, he entered Woodstreet, and took his way towards the grocer's dwelling. When at a little distance from it, he paused, and some minutes elapsed before he could muster strength to go forward. Here, as elsewhere, there were abundant indications of the havoc of the fell disease. Not far from the grocer's shop, and in the middle of the street, lay the body of a young man, with his face, which bore the marks of his death-agonies, turned upwards. Crouching in an angle of the wall sat a young woman watching him, and as the young man drew nearer, he recognised in the dead man the principal of the brotherhood of Saint-Michael, and in the poor mourner, one of his corrupt female associates.

"What has become of your unhappy companions?" he demanded of the woman.

"The last of them lies there," she rejoined mournfully. "All the rest perished long ago of the pestilence. He was true to his vow, and instead of deploring their fate, lived with me and three other women in mirth and revelry till yesterday, when the three women died, and he was taken ill. He did not, however, give in, but continued carousing until within an hour of his death."

"It is an awful lesson," said the young man. "Does it produce no effect on you?"

"How should it?" replied the woman. "He enjoyed himself to the last, and so did I. And now all's over with both of us, for I shall speedily follow him."

The young man made no reply, but proceeded towards the hutch. Beneath a doorway, at a little distance from it, sat a watchman with a halbert on his shoulder, guarding the house; but it was evident that he would be of little further use. His face was covered with his hands, and his groans proclaimed that he himself was attacked by the pestilence. Entering the hutch, the young man pulled the cord of the bell, and the summons was soon after answered by the grocer, who appeared at the shutter.

"What, Leonard Holt!" he exclaimed, in surprise, as he perceived the young man,—"is it you?—what ails you?—you look frightfully ill."

"I have been attacked a second time by the plague," replied the apprentice, "and am only just recovered from it."

"What of my child?" cried the grocer, eagerly,—"what of her?"

"Alas, alas!" exclaimed the apprentice.

"Do not keep me in suspense," rejoined the grocer. "Is she dead?"

"No, not dead," replied the apprentice, "but—"

"But what?" ejaculated the grocer—"in Heaven's name speak."

"These letters will tell you all," replied the apprentice, producing a packet. "I had prepared them to send to you in case of my death. I am not equal to further explanation now."

With trembling eagerness, the grocer lowered the rope, and Leonard having tied the packet to it, it was instantly drawn up.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

HOW BLAIZE WAS ATTACKED BY THE PLAGUE.

NOTWITHSTANDING his anxiety to ascertain the fate of Amabel, Mr. Bloundel would not touch the packet, until he had guarded against the possibility of being infected by it. Seizing it with a pair of tongs, he plunged it into a pan containing a strong solution of vinegar and sulphur, which he had always in readiness in the chamber, and when thoroughly saturated laid it in the sun to dry. On first opening the shutter to answer Leonard's summons, he had flashed off a pistol, and he now sought to expel the external air by setting fire to a ball composed of quick brimstone, saltpetre, and yellow amber, which being placed upon a trencher, speedily filled the room with a thick vapour, and prevented the entrance of any obnoxious air. Those precautions taken, he again addressed himself, while the packet was drying, to Leonard, whom he found anxiously gazing at the window, and informed him that, except being slightly afflicted by scurvy, in consequence of the salt provisions to which they were now confined, all his family were in good health, and had hitherto escaped contagion.

"A special providence must have watched over you, sir," replied the apprentice; "and I believe yours is the only family in the whole city that has been so spared. I have reason to be grateful for my own extraordinary preservation, and yet I would rather it had pleased Heaven to take me away than leave me to my present misery."

"You keep me in a frightful state of suspense, Leonard," replied the grocer, regarding the packet wistfully, "for I dare not open your letters till they are thoroughly fumigated. You assure me my child is living. Has she been attacked by the plague?"

"Would she had," groaned Leonard.

"Is she still at Ashdown?" pursued the grocer. "Ah! you shake your head. I see! I must be beside myself not to have thought of it before. She is in the power of the Earl of Rochester."

"She is," replied Leonard, catching at the angle of the shed for support.

"And I am here," cried Mr. Bloundel, forgetting his caution, and thrusting himself far out of the window. "I am here, when I ought to be near her." And as he spoke, he grasped the rope, with the intention of letting himself down.

"Calm yourself, sir," replied Leonard. "You will only incur risk of contagion, without accomplishing your object. Having traced her, as I supposed, to London, I should never have desisted from my search, if I had not been attacked by the plague on the night of my arrival. I was taken to the pest-house near Westbourne-green, where I have been for the last three weeks."

"If she has been brought to London, as you conjecture," rejoined the grocer, "I cannot doubt but she has fallen a victim to the scourge."

"It may be," replied Leonard, moodily, "and I would almost hope it is so. When you open my letters you will learn that she was carried off by the Earl from the residence of a lady at Kingston Lisle, whither she had been removed for safety, and after being taken from place to place, was at last conveyed to an old hall in the neighbourhood of Oxford, where she was kept concealed for nearly a month."

"Answer me, Leonard," cried the grocer, "and do not attempt to deceive me. Has her honour been preserved?"

"Up to the time of her quitting Oxford, it was so," replied the apprentice. "She herself assured me she had resisted all the Earl's importunities, and would perish rather than yield to him."

"And she will assuredly keep her word," returned the grocer, in a more composed tone. "But how did you contrive to see her?"

"You shall hear," replied Leonard. "After a long search, I discovered the place of her concealment, and climbed in the night, and at the hazard of my life, to the window of the chamber where she was confined. I saw and spoke with her, and having arranged a plan by which I hoped to accomplish her deliverance on the following night, descended. Whether our brief conference was overheard, and communicated to the Earl, I know not; but he secretly departed with his captive the next morning, taking the road, as I subsequently learnt, to London. I instantly started in pursuit, but fell ill, as I have related."

"What you have told me has, in some measure, eased my mind," said Mr. Bloundel, after a pause, "for I feel that my daughter will be able to resist her persecutor. But what has become of your companions?"

"Nizza Macascree has met with the same fate as Amabel," replied Leonard. "She was unfortunate enough to attract the King's attention when he visited Ashdown Lodge, in company of the Earl of Rochester; and I need scarcely tell you, sir, that his Majesty is as unscrupulous and profligate as the worst of his courtiers. She was conveyed to Oxford, where the court is now held, and must speedily have fallen a victim to her royal lover, if she had not disappeared, having been carried off, it was supposed, by Sir Paul Parravicin. But the villain was not able to accomplish his infamous design. The King's suspicion falling upon him, he was instantly arrested, and though he denied all knowledge of Nizza's retreat, and was afterwards liberated, his movements were so strictly watched that he could have no opportunity of seeing her."

"And has nothing more been heard of the poor girl?" asked the grocer.

"Nothing whatever," rejoined Leonard, mournfully.

"You do not mention Blaize," pursued Mr. Bloundel. "No ill I trust has befallen him."

"I grieve to say he has been attacked by the distemper he so much dreaded," replied Leonard, "and, for aught I know may have perished of it. He accompanied me to London, but quitted me when I fell sick, and took refuge with a farmer named Wingfield, residing near Kensall-green. I accidentally met Wingfield this morning, and he informed me that Blaize was taken ill the day before yesterday, and conveyed to the pest-house in Finsbury-fields. I will go thither and see what has become of him."

"I fear the worst," replied the grocer, in a troubled tone. "Few survive an attack now. Your own recovery is little less than a miracle."

"I almost tremble to ask," observed Leonard, "but is Doctor Hodges yet alive?"

"I believe so," replied Mr. Bloundel, "though I have not seen him for the last ten days. I trust he has not fallen a victim to his humanity and exertions."

"I sincerely trust not," returned Leonard; "but I will proceed to his residence presently, and ascertain the truth. To-morrow, if my strength will permit me, I will continue my search for Amabel, and not relax till I find her."

The grocer now disappeared for a few minutes, and on his return lowered a small basket containing a flask of canary, a cake of bread, which he himself had baked, and a piece of cold boiled beef. The apprentice thankfully received the provisions, and retiring to the hutch made a hearty meal, fortifying himself with a copious draught of canary.

Meanwhile, the grocer, finding the packet sufficiently dry, put on a pair of stout leathern gloves, and carefully opening it, commenced reading its contents by the help of powerful glasses. The letters, however, were merely an amplification of Leonard's statement. Having concluded his meal, the apprentice issued from the hutch, and acquainting Mr. Bloundel that he was about to proceed to Doctor Hodges's residence, set off in that direction.

Arrived in Great Knight-rider-street, he was greatly shocked at finding the door of the doctor's habitation fastened, nor could he make any one hear, though he knocked loudly and repeatedly against it. The shutters of the lower windows were closed, and the place looked as if it had been abandoned. All the adjoining houses were shut up, and not a living being could be discerned in the street from whom information might be derived relative to the physician. Here, as elsewhere, the pavement was overgrown with grass, and the very houses had a strange and melancholy look, as if they shared in the general desolation.

On looking down a narrow street leading to the river, Leonard perceived a flock of poultry picking up what they could meet with, and instinctively calling them, they flew towards him, as if delighted at the sound of a human voice. These, and a half-starved cat, were the only living things that Leonard could discern.

At the further end of the street, he caught sight of the river, speeding in its course towards the bridge, and scarcely knowing why he did so, walked to its edge. The tide had just turned, and the stream was sparkling in the sunshine, but no craft could be discovered upon its bosom, and except a few barges moored to its sides, all vestiges of the numberless vessels with which it was once crowded were gone. Its quays were completely deserted. Boxes and bales of goods lay untouched on the wharfs; the cheering cries with which the workmen formerly animated their labour, were hushed. There was no sound of creaking cords;—no rattle of heavy chains;—none of the busy hum ordinarily accompanying a vessel discharging its freight, or receiving goods and stores on board. All traffic was at an end; and this scene, usually one of the liveliest possible, was now forlorn and desolate.

On the opposite shore of the river it appeared to be the same,—indeed, the borough of Southwark was now suffering the utmost rigour of the scourge—and except for the rows of houses on its banks, and the noble bridge by which it was spanned, the Thames appeared as undisturbed as it must have been before the great city was built beside it. Not a sound was heard but the rush of the stream as it flowed past. The large water-mills near the bridge, the noise of which could be distinctly heard on a still day where Leonard stood, were silent. The lofty houses on the bridge were closed like those in the city, and appeared, to Leonard's distempered imagination, to wear the same strange infected look as those he had just gazed at.

The apprentice viewed this scene with a singular kind of interest. He had become so accustomed to melancholy sights that his feelings had lost their acuteness, and the contemplation of the deserted buildings and neglected wharfs around him, harmonized with his own gloomy thoughts. It seemed to him as if he stood on the brink of eternity, and that to struggle longer for a life scarcely worth preserving, was sinful as well as futile. He had no right to consider himself exempted from the common fate. Devoted thousands had been swept away. He could not repine, nor complain that he suffered more severely than his fellows. On the contrary, he had reason to be grateful that he had escaped the anguish which he had seen others endure; and though he almost courted death, yet when he recalled with a thrill of horror the dreadful scenes he had witnessed at the pest-house he had just quitted, he could not help breathing a prayer that his life might be taken in some other way. As he thought, too, of the indescribable agonies which so many thousands had recently endured, and were now enduring, he looked upwards, and, with streaming eyes, implored the compassion of Heaven.

He pursued his walk along the banks of the river to a short distance, when a horrible smell assailed him, and, directed by it, he perceived a carcase in the last state of decomposition, lying in the mud. It had been washed ashore by the tide, and a large bird of prey was contending for possession of it with a legion of water rats. Sickened by the sight, he turned up a narrow thoroughfare near Baynard's Castle, and crossing Thames-street, was ascending Addle-hill, when he perceived a man wheeling a hand-barrow, containing a couple of corpses, in the direction of the river, with the intention, doubtless, of throwing them into it, as the readiest means of disposing of them. Both bodies were stripped of their clothing, and the blue tint of their nails, as well as the blotches with which they were covered, left no doubt as to the disease of which they had died.

Averting his gaze from the spectacle, Leonard turned off on the right along Carter-lane, and threading a short passage, approached the southern precincts of the cathedral, and proceeding towards the great door opposite him, passed through it. The mighty lazaret-house was less crowded than he expected, but its terrible condition far exceeded his worst conceptions. Not more than half the pallets were occupied, but as the sick were in a great measure left to themselves, the utmost disorder prevailed. A group of lazars, with sheets folded around them, glided like a troop of phantoms along Paul's Walk, and mimicked in a ghastly manner the air and deportment of the gallants who had formerly thronged the place.

No attempt being made to maintain silence, the noise was perfectly stunning; some of the sick were shrieking,—some laughing in a wild unearthly manner,—some praying,—some uttering loud execrations,—others groaning and lamenting. The holy building seemed to have become the abode of evil and tormented spirits.

Many dead were lying in the beds,—the few attendants who were present not caring to remove them; and Leonard had little doubt that before another sun went down the whole of the ghastly assemblage before him would have shared their fate. If the habitations he had recently gazed upon had appeared tainted by the pestilence, the sacred structure in which he was now standing seemed yet more horribly contaminated. Ill kept and ill ventilated, the air was loaded with noxious effluvia, while the various abominations that met the eye at every turn would have been sufficient to produce the distemper in any one who had come in contact with them; but they were utterly disregarded by the miserable sufferers and their attendants. The magnificent painted windows were dimmed by a thick clammy steam, which could scarcely be washed off; the carved oak screens, the sculptured tombs, the pillars, the walls, were covered with impurities; and the floor was thickly strewn with poultice-cloths, bandages, and foul linen.

The feelings with which Leonard viewed this scene were not what would have been experienced by a spectator unaccustomed to such horrors. As has been just remarked, his sensibilities had been completely blunted by what he had himself witnessed, and he was quite as much shocked by the degraded state of the noble pile itself, as by the condition of the wretched beings by whom it was tenanted. Hateful as she was to him he could not help looking about for Judith Malmayns, but could nowhere perceive her, and he did not advance far into the structure for fear of coming in contact with the many sick who were staggering along its aisles.

Satisfied with what he had seen, he turned to depart, and was passing the entrance to Saint Faith's, which stood open, when he caught sight of the plague-nurse. She was standing at the foot of the broad stone steps, and held a lamp in her hand. She was conversing with a tall, richly-dressed man, whose features Leonard fancied he had seen before, though he could not at the moment call them to mind. After a brief conversation, they moved off into the depths of the vault, and he lost sight of them.

All at once, it occurred to him that the person he had just seen with Judith was the unfortunate stranger whose child he had interred, and who had been so strangely affected at the sight of Nizza Macascree.

Determined to ascertain the point, he hurried down the steps, and plunged into the vault. It was buried in profound darkness, and he had not proceeded far when he stumbled over something lying in his path, and found from the groan that followed that it was a plague patient.

Before he could regain his feet, the unfortunate sufferer whom he had thus disturbed implored him in piteous accents, which, with a shudder, he recognised as those of Blaize, to remove him. Leonard immediately gave the poor porter to understand that he was near him, and would render him every aid in his power.

"Your assistance comes too late, Leonard," groaned Blaize,—"it's all over with me now, but I don't like to breathe my last in this dismal vault, without medicine or food, both of which I am denied by that infernal hag, Mother Malmayns, who calls herself a nurse, but who is in reality little better than a robber and murderess. Oh! the frightful scenes I have witnessed since I have been brought here. But that my arms have been bound, I would have seized and strangled her. Oh! Leonard, I knew I should not escape the plague. I shall die of it,—I am sure I shall."

"Keep up your courage," rejoined Leonard, "you may yet recover. I have recovered twice, as you see."

"But you were better attended than I have been," returned Blaize, "and it is now too late."

"How did you come hither?" asked Leonard.

"I was first taken to the pest-house, in Finsbury-fields," replied Blaize; "but it was full, and they would not admit me, so I was sent to Saint Paul's, where there was plenty of room. Yesterday, I did pretty well, for I was in the great ward above, and one of the attendants obeyed my directions, and I am certain if they had been fully carried out, I should have got well. I will tell you what I did. As soon as I was placed on a pallet, and covered up with blankets, I ordered a drink to be prepared of the inner bark of an ash tree, green walnuts, scabions, vervain, and saffron, boiled in two quarts of the strongest vinegar. Of this mixture I drank plentifully, and it soon produced a plentiful perspiration. I next had a hen, a live one of course, stripped of the feathers, and brought to me. Holding its bill to the large blotch under my arm, I kept it there till it died from the poison it drew forth. I next repeated the experiment with a pigeon, and derived the greatest benefit from it. The tumour had nearly subsided, and if I had been properly treated afterwards, I should have now been in a fair way of recovery. But instead of nice strengthening chicken broth flavoured with succory and marigolds; or water-gruel mixed with rosemary, and winter-savoury; or a panado seasoned with verjuice or wood sorrel; instead of swallowing copious draughts of warm beer; or water boiled with carduus seeds; or a posset drink made with sorrel, bugross, and borage;—instead of these remedies, or any other, I was carried to this horrible place when I was asleep, and strapped to my pallet, as you perceive. Unloose me, if you can do nothing else."

"That I will readily do," replied Leonard, "but I must first procure a light."

With this, he groped his way among the close ranks of ponderous pillars, but though he proceeded with the utmost caution, he could not avoid coming in contact with the beds of some of the other patients, and disturbing them. At length he descried a glimmer of light issuing from a door which he knew to be that of the vestry, and which was standing slightly ajar. Opening it, he perceived a lamp burning on the table, and without stopping to look around him, seized it, and hurried back to the porter.

Poor Blaize presented a most lamentable, and yet grotesque appearance. His plump person was greatly reduced in bulk, and his round cheeks were hollow and cadaverous. He was strapped, as he had stated, to the pallet, which in its turn was fastened to the adjoining pillar. A single blanket was tightly swathed around him, and a large cloth was bound round his head in lieu of a night-cap. In spite of his compassion Leonard could scarcely refrain from smiling at the porter's strange appearance. He, however, instantly set about releasing him, and had just unfastened the straps when he heard footsteps approaching, and looking up perceived the stranger and Judith Malmayns advancing towards him.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

THE SECOND PLAGUE PIT.

JUDITH, who was a little in advance of her companion, taking Leonard in the first instance for a chironurgeon's assistant, called to him in a menacing voice to let her charge alone; but on drawing nearer, she perceived her mistake, and recognizing the apprentice, halted with a disconcerted look. By this time, the stranger had come up, and remarking her embarrassment, inquired the cause of it.

"Look there," replied Judith, pointing towards the apprentice; "there stands the very man you seek."

"Can it be Leonard Holt?" cried the stranger, gazing earnestly at him.

"It is," rejoined Judith. "You can now put any questions to him you think proper."

The stranger instantly advanced towards the apprentice.

"Do you remember me?" he said.

Leonard answered in the affirmative.

"I owe you a large debt of gratitude," continued the stranger, "and you shall not find me slow to pay it. But let it pass for the moment. Can you tell me aught of Nizza Macasree? I know that she was taken to Oxford by the King, and that she subsequently disappeared."

"Then you know all I can tell you of her, sir," rejoined Leonard.

"I was right, you see, Mr. Thirlby," said Judith. "This youth is utterly ignorant of her retreat."

"My firm conviction is that she has been carried off by Sir Paul Parravicin," remarked Leonard. "But I have no idea where she is concealed."

"Then my last hope of finding her has fallen to the ground," replied Thirlby, with a look of great distress. "Ever since my recovery from the plague, I have been in search of her. I traced her from Ashdown Park to Oxford, but she had disappeared before my arrival at the latter place; and though I made every possible inquiry after her, and kept a strict but secret watch upon the villain whom I supposed, as you do, had carried her off, I could discover no clue to her retreat. Having ascertained, however, that you were seen in the neighbourhood of Oxford about the time of her disappearance, I concluded you must have aided her escape. But now," he added, with a groan, "I find I was mistaken."

"You were so," replied Leonard, mournfully. "I was in search of my master's daughter, Amabel, who was carried off at the same time by the Earl of Rochester, and my anxiety about her made me neglectful of Nizza."

"I do not wonder at it," replied Thirlby, "aware as I am of your devoted attachment to her."

"You will never see Amabel again," observed Judith, eyeing the apprentice maliciously.

"What mean you, woman?" asked Leonard, eagerly.

"I mean what I say," rejoined Judith; "I repeat you will never behold her more."

"You would not speak thus positively without some reason," cried Leonard, springing towards her, and seizing her arm. "Where is she?—What has happened to her?"

Judith burst into a derisive laugh.

"Speak! or I will force you to do so," cried Leonard, furiously.

"Force me!" cried Judith. "You know not whom you threaten."

"But I do," interposed Thirlby. "This young man shall have an answer to his question," he continued, addressing her in an authoritative tone. "Do you know anything about the girl?"

"No," replied Judith, sullenly. "I was merely jesting with him."

"Shame on you to jest on such a subject," rejoined Thirlby, severely. "Come with me, young man. I would speak with you."

"Do not leave me here, Leonard," cried Blaize, "or I shall die before you come back."

"Make yourself easy," rejoined Leonard. "I have no intention of leaving you. Are you aware whether Doctor Hodges is still alive, sir?" he added to Thirlby. "I have just been to his residence in Great Knight-rider-street, and found it shut up."

"He has removed to Watling-street," rejoined the other. "But I have not seen him since my return to London. If you wish it, I will go to his house at once, and send him to look after this poor fellow."

Leonard was about to return thanks for the offer, when the design was frustrated by Blaize, who had been so terrified by Judith's looks, that he could pay no attention to what was going forward, and fearing, notwithstanding Leonard's assurances to the contrary, that he should be left behind, he started to his feet, and wrapping the blanket about him, ran up the steps leading to the cathedral.

Leonard and Thirlby followed, and seeing him dart into the southern aisle, would have pursued him along it, if they had not been afraid of coming in contact with the many sick persons by whom it was thronged. They contented themselves, therefore, with watching his course, and were not a little surprised and alarmed to find the whole troop of lazars set off after him, making the sacred walls resound with their cries.

Frightened by the clamour, Blaize redoubled his speed, and with this ghastly train at his heels, crossed the lower part of the mid aisle, and darting through the pillars, took refuge within Bishop Kempe's Chapel, the door of which he instantly closed after him. Apprehensive of mischief from the crowd of sick persons collected before the door, some of whom were knocking against it, and trying to force it open, Leonard addressed himself to a couple of the attendants, and prevailing on them to accompany him to the chapel, the assemblage was speedily dispersed.

Hearing Leonard's voice, the porter instantly unfastened the door, and as soon as his fears were allayed, he was placed on a pallet within the chapel, and wrapped up in blankets, while such restoratives and remedies, as were deemed proper, were administered to him. Committing him to the care of the attendants, and promising to reward them well for their attention to him, Leonard told Blaize he should now seek Doctor Hodges, and acquaint him with his situation. Accordingly, he took his departure, and finding Thirlby waiting for him at the south door, they went forth together.

"I am almost afraid of leaving the poor fellow," said Leonard, hesitating, as he descended the steps. "Judith Malmayns is so cunning and unscrupulous that she may find some means of doing him an injury."

"Have no fear," replied Thirlby. "I will answer for his safety. She has promised me not to molest him further."

"You appear to have a strange influence over her," remarked Leonard, with a look of surprise. "May I ask in what way you have obtained it?"

"It matters not," replied the other. "Let it suffice that I have exercised it in your behalf."

"And you are not disposed to tell me the nature of the interest you feel in Nizza Macascree?" pursued Leonard.

"Not as yet," replied Thirlby, with a look calculated to put a stop to further inquiries.

Passing through Saint Austin's Gate, they approached Watling Street, at the corner of which stood the house where Doctor Hodges had taken up his temporary abode, that he might visit the sick in the cathedral with greater convenience, and be more readily summoned whenever his attendance was required. Thirlby knocked at the door, and the summons was answered to Leonard's infinite delight by the old porter, who was equally well pleased to see him. The old man informed them that his master had been sent for on a case of urgency early in the morning, and had not yet returned. neither was he aware whether he was gone. He promised, however, to acquaint him with Blaize's condition immediately on his return—"and I need not assure you," he added to Leonard, "that he will instantly attend to him."

Thirlby then inquired of the porter whether Mike Macascree, the blind piper, was still at Dame Lucas's cottage, in Finsbury-fields, and was answered in the affirmative by the old man, who added, however, in a voice of much emotion, that the good dame herself was no more.

"She died about a fortnight ago of the plague," he said, "and is buried where she desired to be, beneath an old apple tree in her garden."

"Alas!" exclaimed Leonard, brushing away a tear, "she has met with the fate she anticipated for herself."

"I am about to visit the piper," observed Thirlby to the apprentice, "and shall be glad of your company, if you will go with me."

The other readily acquiesced, only stipulating that they should call in Wood-street on the way, that he might inquire whether his master wanted him. Thirlby agreeing to this, and the old porter repeating his assurance that he would send his master to Blaize the instant he returned, they set out.

On reaching Wood-street, Leonard gave the customary signal, and the grocer answering it, he informed him of his unexpected meeting with the porter, and of the state in which he had left him. Mr. Bloundel was greatly distressed by the news, and telling Leonard that he should not require his further services that night, besought him to observe the utmost caution. This the apprentice promised, and joining Thirlby, who had walked slowly forward, they struck into a narrow street on the right, and proceeding along Aldermanbury, soon arrived at the first postern in the city walls beyond Cripplegate.

Hitherto, Thirlby had maintained a profound silence, and appeared lost in melancholy reflection. He now and then cast a commiserating glance at the wretched objects they encountered on the road, but otherwise, he kept his eyes steadily fixed upon the ground, and walked at a brisk pace, as if desirous of getting out of the city as quickly as possible. Notwithstanding his weakness, Leonard managed to keep up with him, and his curiosity being greatly aroused by what had just occurred, he began to study his appearance and features attentively. Thirlby was full six feet in height, and possessed a powerful and well proportioned figure, and would have been considered extremely handsome but for a certain sinister expression. His complexion was dark, and his countenance still bore the impress of the dreadful disease from which he had recently recovered. His eyes were large and dark, but lighted up with a peculiar fire, which imparted the sinister expression to his face before mentioned. A gloomy shade sat about his brow, and it seemed to Leonard as if he had been led by his passions into the commission of crimes of which he had afterwards bitterly repented. His deportment was proud and commanding, and though he exhibited no haughtiness towards the apprentice, but on the contrary treated him with great familiarity, it was plain he did so merely from a sense of gratitude. His age was under forty, and his habiliments were rich, though of a sombre colour.

Passing through the postern, which stood wide open, the watchmen having disappeared, they entered a narrow lane, skirted by a few detached houses, all of which were shut up, and marked with the fatal cross. As they passed one of these habitations, they were arrested by loud and continued shrieks of the most heart-piercing nature, and questioning a watchman, who stood at an adjoining door, as to the cause of them, he said they proceeded from a poor lady who had just lost the last of her family by the plague.

"Her husband and all her children, except one daughter, died last week," said the man, "and though she seemed deeply afflicted, yet she bore her loss with resignation. Yesterday, her daughter was taken ill, and she died about two hours ago, since when the poor mother has done nothing but shriek in the way you hear. Poor soul! she will die of grief, as many have done before her at this awful time."

"Something must be done to pacify her," said Thirlby, in a voice of much emotion,—"she must be removed from her child."

"Where can she be removed to?" rejoined the watchman. "Who will receive her?"

"At all events, we can remove the object which occasions her affliction," rejoined Thirlby. "My heart bleeds for her. I never heard shrieks so dreadful."

"The dead-cart will pass by in an hour," said the watchman; "and then the body will be taken away."

"An hour will be too late," said Thirlby. "If she continues in this frantic state, she will be dead before that time. You have a hand-barrow there. Take the body to the plague-pit at once, and I will reward you."

"We shall find some difficulty in getting into the house," said the watchman, who evidently felt some repugnance to the task.

"Not so," replied Thirlby, and pushing forcibly against the door, he burst it open, and directed by the cries entered a room on the right. The watchman's statement proved correct. Stretched upon a bed in one corner lay the body of a beautiful girl, while the poor mother was bending over her in a state bordering upon distraction. On seeing Thirlby, she fled to the further end of the room, but did not desist from her cries; in fact, she was unable to do so, being under the dominion of the wildest hysterical passion.

In vain Thirlby endeavoured to make her comprehend by signs the nature of his errand. She waved him off, and continued shrieking more loudly than ever. Half-stunned by the cries, and greatly agitated by the sight of the child, whose appearance reminded him of his own daughter, Thirlby motioned the watchman who had followed him into the room to bring away the body, and rushed forth. His injunctions were obeyed. The remains of the unfortunate girl were wrapped in a sheet, and deposited in the hand-barrow.

The miserable mother followed the watchman to the door, but did not attempt to interfere with him, and having seen the body of her child disposed of in the manner above-described, turned back. The next moment, a heavy sound announced that she had fallen to the ground, and her shrieks were hushed. Thirlby and Leonard exchanged sad and significant looks, but neither of them returned to see what had happened to her. The watchman shook his head, and setting the barrow in motion, proceeded along a narrow foot-path across the fields. Remarking that he did not take the direct road to the plague-pit, Leonard called to him, and pointed out the quarter in which it lay.

"I know where the old plague-pit is, as well as you (replied the watchman), but it has been filled these three weeks. The new pit lies in this direction."

Shocked at the intelligence, Leonard made no further observation, but walked by the watchman in silence. They presently entered a field, in the middle of which lay the plague-pit, as was evident from the immense mound of clay which had been thrown out of the excavation.

"That pit is neither so deep nor so wide as the old one," said the watchman, "and if the plague goes on at this rate they will soon have to dig another,—that is, if any one should be left alive to undertake the job." And chuckling as if he had said a good thing, he impelled his barrow forward more quickly. A few seconds brought them near the horrible chasm. It was more than half full, and in all respects resembled the other pit, except that it was somewhat smaller. There was the same heaving and putrifying mass,—the same ghastly objects of every kind,—the grey-headed old man, the dark-haired maiden, the tender infant,—all huddled together.

Wheeling his barrow to the edge of the pit, the watchman cast his load into it; and without even waiting to throw a handful of soil over it, turned back, and rejoined Thirlby, who had halted at some distance from the excavation.

While the latter was searching for his purse to reward the watchman, they heard wild shrieks in the adjoining field, and the next moment, perceived the wretched mother running towards them. Guessing her purpose from his former experience, Leonard called to the others to stop her, and stretching out his arms placed himself in her path. But all their efforts were in vain. She darted past them, and though Leonard caught hold of her, she broke from him, and, leaving a fragment of her dress in his grasp, flung herself into the chasm.

Well knowing that all help was vain, Thirlby placed a few pieces of money in the watchman's hand, and hurried away. He was followed by Leonard, who was equally eager to quit the spot. It so chanced that the path they had taken led them near the site of the old plague-pit, and Leonard pointed it out to his companion. The latter stopped for a moment, and then without saying a word, walked quickly towards it. On reaching the spot, they found that the pit was completely filled up. The vast cake of clay with which it was covered had swollen and cracked in an extraordinary manner, and emitted such a horrible effluvium, that they both instantly retreated.

"And that is the grave of my poor child," cried Thirlby, halting and bursting into a passionate flood of tears. "It would have been a fitting resting-place for a guilty wretch like me; but for her it is horrible."

Allowing time for the violence of his grief to subside, Leonard addressed a few words of consolation to him, and then tried to turn the current of his thoughts by introducing a different subject. With this view, he proceeded to detail to Thirlby the piper's mysterious conduct as to the packet, and concluded by mentioning the piece of gold which Nizza wore as an amulet, and which she fancied must have some connection with her early history.

"I have heard of the packet and amulet from Doctor Hodges," said Thirlby; "and should have visited the piper on my recovery from the plague, but I was all impatience to behold Nizza, and could not brook an instant's delay. But you know his cottage. We cannot be far from it."

"Yonder it is," replied Leonard, pointing to the little habitation which lay at a field's distance from them—"and we are certain to meet with him, for I hear the notes of his pipe."

Nor was he deceived, for as they crossed the field, and approached the cottage, the sounds of a melancholy air played on the pipe became each instant more distinct. Before entering the gate, they paused for a moment to listen to the music, and Leonard could not help contrasting the present neglected appearance of the garden with the neatness it exhibited when he last saw it. It was overgrown with weeds, while the drooping flowers seemed to mourn the loss of their mistress. Leonard's gaze involuntarily wandered in search of the old apple tree, and he presently discovered it. It was loaded with fruit, and the rounded sod beneath it proclaimed the grave of the ill-fated Dame Lucas.

Satisfied with this survey, Leonard opened the gate but had no sooner set foot in the garden than the loud barking of a dog was heard, and Bell rushed forth. Leonard instantly called to her, and on hearing his voice, the little animal instantly changed her angry tones to a gladsome whine, and skipping towards him fawned at his feet.

While he stooped to caress her the piper, who had been alarmed by the barking, appeared at the door, and inquired who was there? At the sight of him, Thirlby, who was close behind Leonard, uttered a cry of surprise, and exclaiming, "It is he," rushed towards him.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

WHAT BEFEL THE APPRENTICE ON HIS WAY TO THE CATHEDRAL.

THE cry of recognition uttered by the stranger caused the piper to start as if he had received a sudden and violent shock. The ruddy tint instantly deserted his cheek, and was succeeded by a deadly paleness; his limbs trembled, and he bent forward with a countenance of the utmost anxiety, as if awaiting a confirmation of his fears. When within a couple of yards of him, Thirlby paused, and having narrowly scrutinized his features, as if to satisfy himself he was not mistaken in his man, again exclaimed, but in a lower and deeper tone than before, "It is he!" and seizing his arm, pushed him into the house, banging the door to after him in such a manner as to leave no doubt in the apprentice's mind that his presence was not desired.

Accordingly, though extremely anxious to hear what passed between them, certain that their conversation must relate to Nizza Macascree, Leonard did not attempt to follow, but accompanied by Bell, who continued to gambol round him, directed his steps towards the grave of Dame Lucas. Here he endeavoured to beguile the time in meditation, but in spite of his efforts to turn his thoughts into a different channel, they perpetually recurred to what he supposed to be taking place inside the house. The extraordinary effect produced by Nizza Macascree on Thirlby—the resemblance he had discovered between her and some person dear to him—the anxiety he felt for her, as was evidenced by the search he had recently made—the mysterious connection which clearly subsisted between him and the piper—all these circumstances convinced Leonard that Thirlby was, or imagined himself to be, connected by ties of the closest relationship with the supposed piper's daughter.

Leonard never had been able to discern the slightest resemblance either in manner or feature, or in those indescribably slight personal peculiarities which constitute a family likeness, between Nizza and her reputed father,—neither could he now recal any particular resemblance between her and Thirlby; still, he could not help thinking that her beauty and high-bred looks savoured more of the latter than the former. He came therefore to the conclusion that she must be the offspring of some early and unfortunate attachment on the part of Thirlby, whose remorse might naturally be the consequence of what had then occurred. The only thing that perplexed him was the piper's connection with the affair; but he got over this difficulty by supposing that Nizza's mother, whoever she was, must have committed her to his care, when an infant, probably with strict injunctions, which circumstances might render necessary, to conceal her even from her father. Such was Leonard's solution of the mystery,—whether correct or not will be seen in the sequel.—and feeling convinced that he had made himself master of the stranger's secret, he resolved to give him to understand as much as soon as he beheld him again.

More than half an hour having elapsed, and Thirlby not coming forth, Leonard began to think that sufficient time had been allowed him for private conference with the piper, and he therefore walked towards the door, and coughing to announce his approach, raised the latch, and entered the house. He found the pair seated close together, and conversing in a low and earnest tone. The piper had completely recovered from his fright, and seemed perfectly at ease with his companion, while all traces of anger had disappeared from the countenance of the other. Before them on the table lay several letters, taken from a packet, the cover of which Leonard recognized as the one that had been formerly entrusted to him by the piper. Amidst them was the miniature of a lady,—at least it appeared so to Leonard in the hasty glance he caught of it; but he could not be quite sure, for on seeing him, Thirlby closed the case, and placing his hand on the piper's mouth to check his further speech, arose.

"Forgive my rudeness," he said, "but I have been so deeply interested in what I have just heard, that I quite forgot you were waiting without. I shall remain here some hours longer, but will not detain you, especially as I am unable to admit you to our conference. I will meet you at Doctor Hodges's in the evening, and shall have much to say to you."

"I can anticipate some part of your communication," replied Leonard. "You will tell me you have a daughter still living."

"You are inquisitive, young man," rejoined Thirlby sternly, "and have taken unworthy means, I suspect, to gratify your curiosity."

"You do me wrong, sir," replied Leonard. "I have no curiosity as regards yourself, and if I had, would never lower myself in my own estimation to gratify it. Feeling a strong interest in Nizza Macascree, I am naturally anxious to know whether my suspicion that a near relationship subsists between yourself and her is correct."

"Is your motive for making the inquiry disinterested, young man?" demanded Thirlby.

"Disinterested!" echoed Leonard, with a look of unaffected surprise. "How should it be otherwise?"

"It might well be otherwise," rejoined the stranger—"but I think—nay," he added, after a moment's reflection, "I am sure it is not so."

"May I ask for some explanation of your meaning, sir," rejoined Leonard, "for I am wholly at a loss to comprehend it?"

"Let it pass," replied Thirlby. "I did you an injustice. I did not recollect at the moment that your affections were engaged, and attributed your anxiety about Nizza to a wrong cause."

"I see what you mean, sir," said Leonard, with a mortified look, "but you need give yourself no uneasiness on that score. Your alarm, however, only confirms my suspicions."

"You reason shrewdly, young man," returned Thirlby, "but I cannot enter into further explanation now. Meet me at Doctor Hodges's this evening, and you shall know more. And, now farewell. I am in the midst of a deeply-interesting conversation, which your presence only interrupts. Do not think me rude—do not think me ungrateful. My anxiety must plead my excuse."

"None is necessary, sir," replied Leonard, "I will no longer place any restraint upon you."

So saying, and taking care not to let Bell out, he passed through the door, and closed it after him. Having walked to some distance across the fields, musing on what had just occurred, and scarcely conscious whither he was going, he sat down on the grass, and producing a packet containing a portion of the cold meat and bread given him by his master, sought to repair his exhaustion by a scanty meal. He then yielded to fatigue, and reclining on the ground fell asleep. He awoke after some time much refreshed, and finding he was considerably nearer Bishopsgate than any other entrance into the city, he determined to make for it. A few minutes brought him to a row of houses without the walls, none of which appeared to have escaped contagion, and, passing them, he entered the city gate. He proceeded along the once-crowded, but now utterly-deserted thoroughfare that opened upon him, and could scarcely believe he was in a spot which had once been the busiest of the busy haunts of men—so silent, so desolate did they appear.

On reaching Cornhill, he found it equally deserted. The pavements were overgrown with grass, and neither a vehicle nor a foot passenger was in sight. The Exchange was abandoned, and, as Leonard looked at its closed gates, a saddening train of reflection passed through his mind. His head declined upon his breast, and he continued lost in a mournful reverie until he was roused by a hand laid on his shoulder, and starting, for such a salutation at this season was alarming, he looked round, and beheld Solomon Eagle.

"You are looking upon that structure," said the enthusiast, "and are thinking how much it is changed. Men who possess boundless riches imagine that their power is above that of their Maker—that they may neglect him, and defy him. But they are mistaken. Where are now the wealthy merchants that used to haunt those courts and walks?—why do they not come here as of old?—why do they not buy and sell, and send their messengers and ships to the farthest parts of the world? Because the Lord hath smitten them and driven them forth—'From the least of them even to the greatest of them,' as the prophet Jeremiah saith, 'every one is given to covetousness.' The balances of deceit have been in their hands. They have cozened their neighbours, and greedily gained from them, and will find it true what the prophet Ezekiel hath written, that 'the Lord will pour out his indignation upon them, and consume them with the fire of his wrath.' Yea, I tell you, unless they turn from their evil ways, unless they cast aside the golden idol they now worship, and set up God in its stead, a fire will be sent to consume them, and that pile which they have erected as a temple to their Deity shall be burnt to the ground."

Leonard's heart was too full to make any answer to the enthusiast's denunciation. The latter, therefore, after a brief pause, again addressed him.

"I am glad I have encountered you," he said, "because I have tidings which will give you satisfaction. You need not tell me what has happened during your absence from London, for I have learnt it since I saw you, and what is more I think I have found out where Amabel is concealed."

"Is she in London?" demanded the apprentice eagerly.

Solomon Eagle nodded in the affirmative.

"Where—where?" cried the apprentice. "Oh, guide me to her retreat!"

"It is impossible at this moment," replied the enthusiast. "But if you come to me, as I have appointed, at midnight, I have no doubt I shall be able to accomplish your desire. Whither are you going?"

"To Saint Paul's," replied Leonard—"to see how my master's porter, Blaize Shoterel, is going on."

"I can tell you," replied Solomon Eagle. "Doctor Hodges has just been with him, and having dressed his sores, pronounces him in a fair way of recovery."

"I am glad to hear it," replied Leonard. "Do you know whether the doctor is at the cathedral, or at his own house?"

"He is not at either place," returned the enthusiast

"He is at this moment following up the clue which I have given him to Amabel's retreat."

"Oh! if you have told him where she is," cried the apprentice, "why not tell me?"

"I have good reasons for what I do," replied Solomon Eagle, coldly, "and whatever may be your impatience, you must abide my time."

"Answer me one question at least," cried Leonard. "Is she with the Earl of Rochester?"

"Aye," replied Solomon Eagle; "but I shall allay your fears in that respect when I tell you she has been attacked by the plague."

Leonard heard nothing more, for uttering a wild shriek, he fell to the ground insensible. He was aroused to consciousness by a sudden sense of strangulation, and opening his eyes, beheld two dark figures bending over him, one of whom was kneeling on his chest. A single glance sufficed to show him that this person was Chowles; and instantly comprehending what was the matter, and aware that the coffin-maker was stripping him previously to throwing him into the dead-cart, which was standing hard by, he cried aloud, and struggled desperately to set himself free. Little opposition, however, was offered to him, for on hearing the cry, Chowles quitted his hold, and retreating to a short distance, exclaimed, with a look of surprise, "Why, the fellow is not dead after all."

"I am neither dead, nor likely to die, as you shall find to your cost, rascal, if you do not restore me the clothes you have robbed me of," cried Leonard furiously.

And chancing to perceive a fork which Chowles had dropped in his hasty retreat, he snatched it up, and brandishing it over his head, advanced towards him in a menacing manner. Thus threatened, Chowles tossed him a rich suit of livery.

"These are not mine," said the apprentice, gazing at the habiliments.

"They are better than your own," replied Chowles, "and therefore you ought to be glad of the exchange. But give me them back again. I have no intention of making you a present."

"This is the livery of the Earl of Rochester," cried Leonard.

"Why, ay, it is," replied Chowles, with a ghastly smile. "One of his servants is just dead."

"Where is his lordship?" cried Leonard eagerly.

"There is the person who owned these clothes," replied Chowles, evasively, and pointing at the same time to the dead-cart. "You had better address your inquiries to him."

"Where is the Earl of Rochester, I say, villain?" cried Leonard, menacingly.

"How should I know?" rejoined Chowles. "Here are your clothes," he added, pushing them towards him.

"I will have an answer," cried Leonard.

"Not from me," replied Chowles.

And hastily snatching up the livery, he put the cart in motion, and proceeded on his road.

Leonard would have followed him, but the state of his attire did not permit him to do so. He now called to mind what had passed between him and Solomon Eagle, and had no doubt (as was really the case) that he had been placed in such a position by the enthusiast, that when he recovered from the swoon into which he had fallen he would sustain no injury. It so chanced, however, that he had been found in this situation by Chowles, who, supposing him dead, had begun to strip him, as before related. His restoration to sensibility at this juncture saved him from being tossed into the dead cart, and in all probability, therefore, from a third attack of the plague, which would most likely have been the result of the horrible contact to which he would have been subjected.

Having put on his things, Leonard shaped his course towards the cathedral, where he soon found the attendant who had the charge of Blaize.

"Doctor Hodges has been with him," said the man, in reply to his inquiries after the porter, "and has good hopes of him; but the patient is not entirely satisfied with the treatment he has received, and wishes some remedies of his own to be tried. If his request, however, were to be granted, all would soon be over with him."

"That I can easily conceive," replied Leonard. "But let us go to him."

"You must not heed his complaints," returned the attendant. "I assure you he is doing as well as possible, but he is so dreadfully frightened at a trifling operation which Doctor Hodges finds it necessary to perform upon him, that we have been obliged to fasten him to the bed."

"Indeed!" exclaimed Leonard. "Has Judith Malmayns had no hand in this arrangement?"

"Judith Malmayns has been absent during the whole of the afternoon," said the man, "and another nurse has taken her place in Saint Faith's. She has never been near Blaize since I have had charge of him."

By this time they had reached the pallet in which the porter was laid. His eyes and a small portion of his snub nose were alone visible—his head being enveloped by a linen cloth as already mentioned, while his mouth was covered by the blankets that were heaped upon him. He looked so anxiously at the apprentice that the latter removed the blankets from his mouth, and enabled him to speak.

"I am glad to find you are getting on so well," said Leonard, in a cheerful tone. "Doctor Hodges has been with you, I understand?"

"He has," groaned Blaize—"but he has done me no good—none whatever. I could doctor myself much better if he would allow me, for I know every remedy that has been prescribed for the plague, but he would adopt none that I mentioned to him. I wanted him to place a hot loaf fresh from the oven to the tumour to draw it, but he would not consent. Then I asked for a cataplasm, composed of radish-roots, mustard-seed, onions and garlic roasted, mithridate, salt, and soot from a chimney where wood only has been burnt. This he liked no better than the first. Next, I begged for an ale posset with pimpernel soaked in it, assuring him that by frequently drinking such a mixture, Secretary Naunton drew the infection from his very heart. But the doctor would have none of it, and seemed to doubt the fact.

"What did he do?" inquired Leonard.

"He applied oil of Saint John's wort to the tumour," replied Blaize, with a dismal groan, "and said if the scar did not fall off he must cauterize it. Oh! I shall never be able to bear the pain of the operation."

"Recollect your life is at stake," rejoined Leonard. "You must either submit to it or die."

"I know I must," replied Blaize, with a prolonged groan, "but it is a terrible alternative."

"You will not find the operation so painful as you imagine," rejoined Leonard, "and you know I speak from personal experience."

"You give me great comfort," said Blaize, "And so you really think I shall get better?"

"I have no doubt you will, if you keep up your spirits," replied Leonard. "The worst is evidently over. You must behave yourself like a man."

"I will try to do so," rejoined Blaize. "I have been told that if a circle is drawn with a blue sapphire round a plague blotch, it will fall off."

"It will not do to rely upon that remedy," observed the attendant, with a smile. "You will find a small knob of red hot iron, which we call 'the button,' much more efficacious."

"Oh, dear! oh, dear!" exclaimed Blaize, "I already feel that dreadful button burning into my flesh."

"On the contrary, you will not feel it at all," replied the attendant; "for the iron only touches the point of the tumour in which there is no sensibility."

"In that case, I don't care how soon the operation is performed," replied Blaize.

"Doctor Hodges will choose his own time for it," said the attendant; "in the mean time, here is a cup of barley-broth for you. You will find it do you good."

While the man applied the cup to the poor porter's lips, for he would not unloose the straps for fear of mischief, Leonard, who was sickened by the terrible scene around him, took his leave, and quitted the cathedral by the great western entrance. His first intention was to proceed to Wood-street, and acquaint Mr. Bloundel with what he had learnt, but on second thoughts, he determined to wait till he obtained further information. Thinking he might as well remain where he was as proceed further, he seated himself on one of the great blocks of stone which had been used in repairing the cathedral, and which had been left where they were by the workmen, who had long since abandoned their employment. Evening was drawing on apace,—and never did a more glorious sunset herald the approach of night. Leonard looked towards the cathedral. The oblique rays of the sun had quitted the columns of the portico, which looked cold and grey, while the roof and towers were glittering in light. In ten minutes more only the summit of the central tower caught the last reflection of the declining orb.

Leonard watched that rosy gleam till it disappeared, and then steadfastly regarded the walls of the cathedral, as their hue changed from grey to black, until at length each pinnacle and buttress, each battlement and tower was lost in one vast indistinct mass. Night had fallen upon the city,—a night destined to be more fatal than any that had preceded it. And yet it was so calm, so beautiful, so clear, that it was scarcely possible to imagine that it was not healthy. The destroying angel was, however, at work at that moment. Hundreds were falling beneath his touch, and as Leonard wondered how many miserable wretches were at that moment released from suffering, it crossed him like an icy chill at the same time, that among the victims might be Amabel. So forcibly was he impressed by this idea that he fell on his knees, and prayed aloud.

He was aroused by hearing the ringing of a bell, which announced the approach of the dead cart, and presently afterwards the gloomy vehicle approached from Ludgate-hill, and moved slowly towards the portico of the Cathedral, where it halted. A great number of dead were placed within it, and the driver, ringing his bell proceeded in the direction of Cheapside. A heavy dew had fallen, for as Leonard put his hand to his clothes, they felt damp, and his long hair was loaded with moisture. Reproaching himself with having needlessly exposed himself to risk, he was about to walk away, when he heard footsteps approaching, and looking in the direction of the sound, perceived a tall figure, which he recognised as that of Thirlby. Calling to him, the other, who appeared to be in haste, halted for a moment, and telling the apprentice he was going to Doctor Hodges's, begged him to accompany him, and they accordingly proceeded in the direction of Watling-street.

CHAPTER XL.

THE HOUSE IN NICHOLAS-LANE.

ON reaching Doctor Hodges' residence, Leonard and his companion found him from home. This did not much surprise the apprentice after the information he had received from Solomon Eagle, but Thirlby was greatly disappointed, and eagerly questioned the porter as to the probable time of his master's return. The man replied that it was quite uncertain, adding, "He has been in since you were last here, and has seen Blaize. He had not been gone to the cathedral many minutes when a gentleman arrived desiring his instant attendance on a young woman who was attacked by the plague."

"Did you hear her name?" asked Leonard and Thirlby, in a breath.

"I did not," replied the porter, "neither did I obtain any information respecting her from the gentleman, who appeared in great distress. But I observed that my master on his return looked much surprised at seeing him, and treated him with a sort of cold respect."

"Was the person young or old?" demanded Leonard hastily.

"As far as I noticed," replied the porter, "for he kept his face covered with a handkerchief, I should say he was a young man."

"You are sure it was not Lord Rochester?" pursued Leonard.

"How should I be sure of it," rejoined the porter, "since I have never seen his lordship that I am aware of. But I will tell you all that happened, and you can then form your own judgment of the matter. My master, as I have just said, looked surprised and angry, bowing gravely, conducted the stranger to his study, taking care to close the door after him. I did not of course hear what passed, but the interview was brief enough, and the gentleman issuing forth, said as he quitted the room, 'You will not fail to come?' To which my master replied, 'Certainly not, on the terms I have mentioned.' And with this, the gentleman hurried out of the house. Shortly afterwards, the Doctor came out of his room and said to me, 'I am going to attend a young woman who is sick of the plague, and may be absent for some time. If Mr. Thirlby or Leonard Holt should call, detain them till my return.'"

"I cannot help thinking that Amabel is the young woman he is gone to visit," said Leonard Holt, sorrowfully.

"I suspect it is Nizza Macascree," cried Thirlby. "Which way did your master take?"

"I did not observe," replied the porter, "but he told me he should cross London-bridge."

"I will go into Southwark in quest of him," said Thirlby. "Every moment is of consequence now."

"You had better stay where you are," remarked the old porter. "It will be the surest way to meet with him."

Thirlby, however, was too full of anxiety to listen to reason, and his impatience producing a corresponding effect upon Leonard, though from a different motive, they set forth together.

"If I fail to find him, you may expect me back ere long," were Thirlby's last words to the porter. Hurrying along Watling-street, and taking the first turn on the right he descended to Thames-street, and made the best of his way towards the bridge. Leonard followed him closely, and they pursued their rapid course in silence. By the time they reached the north gate of the bridge, Leonard found his strength failing him, and halting at one of the openings between the tall houses over-looking the river, where there was a wooden bench for the accommodation of passengers, he sank upon it, and begged Thirlby to go on, saying he would return to Watling-street as soon as he recovered from his exhaustion. Thirlby did not attempt to dissuade him from his purpose, but instantly disappeared.

The night, it has been before remarked, was singularly beautiful. It was almost as light as day, for the full September moon having just arisen, revealed every object with perfect distinctness. The bench on which Leonard was seated lay on the right side of the bridge, and commanded a magnificent reach of the river, which flowed beneath like a sheet of molten silver. The apprentice gazed along its banks, and noted the tall spectral-looking houses on the right, until his eye finally settled on the massive fabric of Saint Paul's, the roof and towers of which rose far above the lesser structures. His meditations were suddenly interrupted by the opening of a window in the house near him, while a loud splash in the water told that a body had been thrown into it. He turned away with a shudder, and at the same moment perceived a watchman with a halbert upon his shoulder, advancing slowly towards him from the Southwark side of the bridge.

Pausing as he drew near the apprentice, the man compassionately inquired whether he was sick, and being answered in the negative, was about to pass on, when Leonard, who fancied he recognised his voice, stopped him.

"We have met somewhere before, friend," he said, "though where, or under what circumstances, I cannot at this moment call to mind."

"Not unlikely," returned the other roughly, "but the chances are if we ever meet again."

Leonard heaved a sigh at the remark.

"I now recollect where I met you, friend," he said. "It was at Saint Paul's, when I was in search of my master's daughter, who had been carried off by the Earl of Rochester. But you were then in the garb of a smith."

"I recollect the circumstance, too, now you remind me of it," replied the other. "Your name is Leonard Holt as surely as mine is Robert Rainbird. I recollect also that you offended me about a dog belonging to the piper's pretty daughter, Nizza Macascree, which I was about to destroy in obedience to the Lord Mayor's orders. However, I bear no malice, and if I did, this is not a time to rip up old quarrels."

"You are right, friend," returned Leonard. "The few of us left ought to be in charity with each other."

"Truly, ought we," rejoined Rainbird. "For my own part, I have seen so much misery within the last few weeks, that my disposition is wholly changed. I was obliged to abandon my old occupation of a smith, because my master died of the plague, and there was no one else who could or would employ me. I have therefore served as a watchman, and in twenty days have stood at the doors of as many houses. It would freeze your blood were I to relate the scenes I have witnessed."

"It might have done so formerly," replied Leonard,—"but my feelings are as much changed as yours. I have had the plague twice myself."

"Then, indeed, you can speak," replied Rainbird. "Ah! these are terrible times—terrible times! The worst that ever London knew. Although I have been hitherto miraculously preserved myself, I am firmly persuaded no one will escape."

"I am almost inclined to agree with you," replied Leonard.

"For the last week the distemper has raged fearfully—fearfully indeed," said Rainbird; "but yesterday and to-day have far exceeded all that have gone before. The distempered have died quicker than cattle of the murrain. I visited upwards of a hundred houses in the Borough this morning, and only found ten persons alive; and out of those ten not one I will venture to say is alive now. It will, in truth, be a mercy if they are gone. There were distracted mothers raving over their children,—a young husband lamenting his wife,—two little children weeping over their dead parents, with none to attend them, none to feed them,—an old man mourning over his son, cut off in his prime,—in short, misery and distress in their worst form. The streets were ringing with shrieks and groans, and the numbers of dead were so great that it was impossible to carry them off. You remember Solomon Eagle's fearful prophecy!"

"Perfectly," replied Leonard; "and I lament to see its fulfilment."

"The streets shall be covered with grass, and the living shall not be able to bury the dead,—so it ran," said Rainbird. "And it has come to pass. Not a carriage of any description, save the dead-cart, is to be seen in the broadest streets of London, which are now as green as the fields without her walls, and as silent as the grave itself. Terrible times, as I said before,—terrible times! The dead are rotting in heaps in the courts, in the alleys, in the very houses, and no one will remove them. What will be the end of it all? What will become of this great city?"

"It is not difficult to foresee what will become of it," replied Leonard, "unless it shall please God to stay his vengeful arm. And something whispers in my ear that we are now at the worst. The scourge cannot exceed its present violence without working our ruin, and deeply as we have sinned, little as we repent, I cannot bring myself to believe that a merciful Providence will sweep his people entirely from the face of the earth."

"I dare not hope otherwise," rejoined Rainbird, "though I would fain do so. I discern no symptoms of abatement in the malignity of the distemper, but, on the contrary, an evident increase of violence, and such is the opinion of all I have spoken with on the subject. Chowles told me that he buried two hundred more yesterday than he had ever done before, and yet he did not carry a third of the dead to the plague pit. He is a strange fellow that Chowles. But for his passion for his horrible calling there is no necessity for him to follow it, for he is now one of the richest men in London."

"He must have amassed his wealth by robbery, then," remarked Leonard.

"True," returned Rainbird. "He helps himself without scruple to the clothes, goods, and other property of all who die of the pestilence, and after ransacking their houses, conveys his plunder in the dead cart to his own dwelling."

"In Saint Paul's?" asked Leonard.

"No, a large house in Nicholas-lane, once belonging to a wealthy merchant, who perished with his family of the plague," replied Rainbird. "He has filled it from cellar to garret with the spoil he has obtained."

"And how has he preserved it?" inquired the apprentice.

"The plague has preserved it for him," replied Rainbird. "The few authorities who now act have, perhaps, no knowledge of his proceedings; or if they have, have not cared to interfere with them, awaiting a more favourable season, if it should ever arrive, to dispossess him of his store, and punish him for his delinquencies, while in the meantime they are glad, on any terms, to avail themselves of his services as a burier. Other people do not care to meddle with him, and the most daring robber would be afraid to touch infected money or clothes."

"His wealth will be utterly useless to him," observed Leonard.

"Why so I think," said Rainbird. "I would not question the decrees of Heaven, but it seems strange that such wretches as this Chowles and his partner in crime and iniquity, Judith Malmayns, with others of the same stamp, should be spared, while so many thousand good persons are swept off."

"They are preserved for a wise purpose," said Leonard, rising from his seat. "If you are going towards Nicholas-lane," he continued, as if struck with a sudden idea, "and will point out to me the house occupied by Chowles, you will do me a favour."

Rainbird nodded assent, and they walked on together towards Fish-street Hill. Ascending it, and turning off on the right, they entered Great Eastcheap, but had not proceeded far when they were obliged to turn back, the street being literally choked up with a pile of carcases deposited there by the buriers' assistants. Shaping their course along Gracechurch-street, they beheld several poor wretches stretched on the steps of the conduit, then standing in the midst of this thoroughfare; whether dead or asleep they did not pause to inquire, but as no sound arose from them, the latter was most probably the case. Arrived at the entrance into Lombard-street, they turned off into it, and as Leonard gazed at the goldsmiths' houses on either side, which were all shut up, with the fatal red cross on the doors, he could not help remarking to his companion, "The plague has not spared any of these on account of their riches."

"True," replied the other, "and of the thousands who used formerly to throng this street not one is left. Wee to London!—wee!—wee!"

Leonard echoed the sentiment, and fell into a melancholy train of reflection. It has been more than once remarked that the particular day now under consideration was the one in which the plague exercised its fiercest dominion over the city; and though at first its decline was as imperceptible as the gradual diminution of the day after the longest has passed, yet still the alteration began. On that day, as if Death had known that his power was to be speedily arrested, he sharpened his fellest arrows, and discharged them with unerring aim, careering through every street, and visiting every habitation that had hitherto escaped him. And he did his work with unusual promptitude. Almost the only house in the whole city that escaped was that in Wood-street, and the grocer subsequently attributed his preservation to having passed the whole of the night with his family in devotion. "I knew," he said, "that thousands were dying around me,—that the angel of the Lord was carrying out the work of destruction, and I felt that my business was watchfulness and prayer, that if I was sought for, I might not be found unprepared." Throughout that terrible night, therefore, when in a thousand chambers the groans of the afflicted and dying were heard,—when the shrieks of the bereaved broke upon the startled ear,—and when the unburied dead lay in heaps within the streets, the grocer continued in deep and earnest prayer, never for one moment suffering his thoughts to dwell upon earth, or upon his own private sorrows.

"Is there anything more terrible than the noisome pestilence?" asks an eloquent writer, when treating of the plague in question. "No," he replies, "and if its stench come into your nostrils ye are gone. It is a weapon so sharp that it is able to leave a nation without an heir; for I, saith the Lord, will smite them with the pestilence, and disinherit them. If this pale horse come to neigh in our streets, he will dash many thousands into their graves. If the pestilence do once discharge, how many will he slay at a shot? It will chase men out of their dwellings, as if there were some fierce enemy pursuing them; and shut up shop doors, as if execution after judgment were served on merchants. There will then be no other music than doleful knells, nor any other wares carried up and down but dead corpses. It will change mansion houses into pest-houses, and rather gather congregations into churchyards than churches. The markets will be so empty that scarcely necessaries will be brought in. A new set of brewers will set up, even apothecaries, to make diet drink. People will be afraid to eat meat, lest they should eat it out of infected shambles, or to wear raiment lest it should be stitched up with the plague. They shall lie down without the least spot, and rise up with God's tokens upon them—yea, with the carbuncle burning in their flesh like a fire-coal. They shall walk well out of their houses, and drop down before they come home again. Every disease turns into the plague. Come not nigh thy soundest friend within the compass of two cubits, nor within the space of six cubits of infected persons. Beware lest the wind blow upon him to thee, or lest there be any sun, fire, or odours between him and thee. If thou beest well, eschew thy dearest acquaintance; if thou beest sick, thy dearest acquaintance will flee thee. A lord shall scarce have a page, a lady a chambermaid, to wait on them. A brother will scarce look down on a sister, a husband on his wife, or a tender mother on her darling infant. A beggar will not wear thy marriage suit if given him, nor a porter be hired to carry thine errand, though thou should give him a leave for life for his journey. Thy gold is left to the justice of a steward, thy breath to the mercy of a nurse. Thou art dead whilst left unburied, and buried without any but bearers to go along with thine hearse. Of all business the plague is the fray; of all dreadful things which can happen upon the earth this is the horror. Oh! cleanse the streets with repentance, purge the air with obedience. Above all, feel the plague in your hearts, that you may not feel the plague in your sides. If the arrow that flieth by noon-day shall glide among you, how many wounded breasts would there be? If Hippocrates were among you with his sweet odours and sweet ointments to perfume places; if Mindererus were shooting off guns in every street to dissipate the air; if Quercitan and Avicen were prescribing the strictest rules of diet; if Galen, and the whole tribe of the most expert physicians that ever lived, were teaching you to make pills, electuaries, pomanders, and cordials; to make new fires and fumigations of storax, calamint, and labdanum, and a hundred other materials to expel ill scents; yet they may be all ineffectual to prevent that irresistible stroke." To the foregoing quaint but admirable description of the pestilence, may be added a passage from the "Loimologia" of Doctor Hodges, in which he says—"That the plague spared no order, age, or sex. The divine was taken in the very exercise of his priestly office, to be enrolled among the saints above, and some physicians could not find assistance in their own antidotes, but died in the administration of them to others. Many in their old age, others in their prime, sunk under its cruelties. Of the female sex most died, and hardly any children escaped; and it was not uncommon to see an inheritance pass successively to three or four heirs in as many days. The number of sextons were not sufficient to bury the dead; the bells seemed hoarse with continual tolling, until at last they quite ceased; the burying places would not hold the dead, but they were thrown into large pits digged in waste grounds, in heaps, thirty or forty together; and it often happened that those who attended the funerals of their friends one evening, were carried the next to their long home."

Frightful as these pictures appear, they yet fall far short of the reality on the dreadful night in question. To pursue the course of the destroyer from house to house—to show with what unrelenting fury he assailed his victims—to describe their sufferings—to number the dead left within their beds, thrown into the streets, or conveyed to the plague-pits—would be to present a narrative as painful as revolting. The worst, however, had at last arrived. The heat of the weather had undergone some slight abatement, but the wholesome frosts of September had not yet made themselves felt, and the nights, though bright and beautiful, were singularly oppressive. On this particular night it was as hot as if it had been the middle of June. No air was stirring, and the silence was so profound, that a slight noise was audible at a great distance. Hushed in this seemingly placid repose lay the great city, while hundreds of its inhabitants were groaning in agony, or breathing their last sigh.

On reaching the upper end of Nicholas-lane, Rainbird stood still for a moment, and pointing out a large house on the right, just below the old church dedicated to the Saint from which the thoroughfare took its name, informed Leonard that it was Chowles's residence. They were about to proceed towards it, when the smith again paused, and called Leonard's attention to two figures quickly advancing from the lower end of the street. As the apprentice and his companion stood in the shade they could not be seen, while the two figures, being in the moonlight, were fully revealed. One of them it was easy to perceive was Chowles. He stopped before the door of his dwelling and unfastened it, and while he was thus occupied, the other person turned his face so as to catch the full radiance of the moon, and disclosed the features of Sir Paul Parravicin. Before Leonard recovered from the surprise into which he was thrown by this unexpected discovery, they had entered the house.

He then hurried forward, but to his great disappointment found the door locked. Anxious to get into the house without alarming those who had preceded him, he glanced at the windows, but the shutters were closed, and strongly barred. While hesitating what to do, Rainbird came up, and guessing his wishes, told him there was a door at the back of the house by which he might probably gain admittance. Leonard entreated him to show him the way to it, and the other accordingly hastened down a passage skirting the churchyard of Saint Nicholas, which brought them to a narrow alley, lying between Nicholas-lane and Abchurch-lane. Tracking it for about twenty yards, he paused before a small yard door, and trying the latch, found it yielded to his touch.

CHAPTER XLI.

HOW LEONARD DISCOVERED NIZZA MACASCREE.

Crossing the yard, Leonard and Rainbird came to another door. It was locked, and though they could have easily burst it open, they preferred having recourse to an adjoining window, the shutter of which being carelessly fastened, was removed without noise or difficulty. In another moment, they gained a small dark room on the ground floor, whence they issued into a passage, where, to their great joy, they found a lighted lantern placed on a chair. Leonard hastily possessed himself of it, and was about to enter a room on the left when his companion arrested him.

"Before we proceed further," he said, in a low voice, "I should like to know what you are about to do?"

"My purpose will be explained in a word," replied the apprentice, in the same tone. "I suspect that Nizza Macascree is confined here by Sir Paul Paravicin and Chowles, and if it turns out that I am right in my conjecture, I propose to liberate her. Will you help me?"

"Humph!" exclaimed Rainbird, "I don't much fancy the job. However, since I am here, I'll not leave you. I am curious to see the coffin-maker's hoards. Look at yon heap of clothes. There are velvet doublets and silken hose enow to furnish wardrobes for a dozen court gallants. And yet rich as the stuffs are, I would not put the best of them on for all the wealth of London."

"Nor I," replied Leonard. "I shall make free, however, with a sword," he added, selecting one from the heap. "I may need a weapon."

"I require nothing more than my halbert," observed the smith; "and I would advise you to throw away that velvet scabbard. It is a certain harbour for infection."

Leonard did not neglect the caution, and pushing open the door, they entered a large room, which resembled an upholsterer's shop, being literally crammed with chairs, tables, cabinets, moveable cupboards, bedsteads, curtains, and hangings, all of the richest description, and piled one upon another.

"What I heard is true," observed Rainbird, as he gazed around in astonishment. "Chowles must have carried off everything he could lay hands upon. What can he do with all that furniture?"

"What the miser does with his store," replied Leonard. "Feast his eyes with it, but never use it."

They then proceeded to the next room. It was crowded with books, looking-glasses, and pictures; many of them originally of great value, but greatly damaged by the careless manner in which they had been handled. A third apartment was filled with flasks of wine, with casks probably containing spirits, and boxes, the contents of which they did not pause to examine. A fourth contained male and female habiliments, spread out like the dresses in a theatrical wardrobe. Most of these garments were of the gayest and costliest description, and of the latest fashion, and Leonard sighed as he looked upon them, and thought of the pride and vanity that had been laid low, and of the youth and beauty cut off in its prime.

"There is contagion enough in those clothes to infect a whole city," said Rainbird, who regarded them with different feelings. "I have half a mind to set fire to them."

"You would do a good deed," returned Leonard; "but it must not be now. Let us go up stairs. These are the only rooms below."

Accordingly, they ascended the staircase, and entered chamber after chamber, all of which were as full of spoil as those they had just visited, but they could find no one,—neither was there any symptom that the house was tenanted. They next stood still within the gallery, and listened intently for any sound that might reveal those they sought, but all was as still and silent as the grave.

"We cannot be mistaken," observed Leonard. "It is clear that this house is the receptacle for Chowles's plunder. Besides, we should not have found the lantern burning if they had gone forth again. No, no; they must be hidden somewhere, and I will not quit the place till I find them."

Their search, however, was fruitless. They mounted to the garrets, opened every door, and glanced into every corner. Still, no one was to be seen.

"This is strange," observed Rainbird. "I have long suspected Chowles of dealing with the devil, and now I am sure I was right."

"I begin to think Nizza cannot be here," said the apprentice, "but I am resolved not to depart without questioning Chowles on the subject."

"You must first find him," rejoined Rainbird. "If he is any where, he must be in the cellar, for we have been into every room in this part of the house. For my own part, I think you had better abandon the search altogether. No good will come of it."

Leonard, however, was not to be dissuaded, and they went down stairs. A short flight of stone steps brought them to a spacious kitchen, but it was quite empty, and seemed to have been long disused. They then peeped into the scullery adjoining, and were about to retrace their steps, when Rainbird plucked Leonard's sleeve to call his attention to a gleam of light, issuing from a door which stood partly ajar, in a long narrow passage leading apparently to the cellars.

"They are there," he said, in a whisper.

"So I see," replied Leonard in the same tone. And raising his finger to his lips in token of silence, he stole forward on the points of his feet, and cautiously opened the door.

At the further end of the cellar—for such it was—knelt Chowles, examining with greedy eyes the contents of a large chest, which, from the hasty glance that Leonard caught of it, appeared to be filled with gold and silver plate. A link stuck against the wall, threw a strong light over the scene, and showed that the coffin-maker was alone. As Leonard advanced the sound of his footsteps caught Chowles's ear, and uttering a cry of surprise and alarm, he let fall the lid of the chest, and sprang to his feet.

"What do you want?" he cried, looking uneasily round, as if in search of some weapon. "Are you come to rob me?"

"No," replied Leonard, "neither are we come to reclaim the plunder you have taken from others. We are come in search of Nizza Macasree."

"Then you have come on a fool's errand," replied Chowles, with his usual effrontery, "for she is not here. I know nothing of her."

"That is false," rejoined Leonard. "You have just conducted Sir Paul Parravicin to her."

This assertion on the part of the apprentice, which he thought himself, under the circumstances, justified in making, produced a strong effect on Chowles. He appeared startled and confounded.

"What right have you to play the spy upon me thus?" he faltered.

"The right that every honest man possesses to check the designs of the wicked," replied Leonard. "You admit that she is here. Lead me to her hiding-place without more ado."

"If you know where it is," rejoined Chowles, who now perceived the artifice that had been practised upon him, "you will not want me to conduct you to it. Neither Nizza nor Sir Paul Parravicin are here."

"That is false, prevaricating scoundrel," cried Leonard. "My companion and I saw you enter the house with your profligate employer. And as we gained admittance in a few minutes after you, it is certain no one can have left it. Lead me to Nizza's retreat instantly, or I will cut your throat."

And seizing Chowles by the collar, he held the point of his sword to his breast.

"Use no violence," cried Chowles, struggling to free himself, "and I will take you wherever you please. This way—his way."

And he motioned as if he would take them up-stairs.

"Do not think to mislead me, villain," cried Leonard, tightening his grasp. "We have searched every room in the upper part of the house, and though we have discovered the whole of your ill-gotten hoards, we could find nothing else. No one is there."

"Well, then," rejoined Chowles, "since the truth must be told, Sir Paul is in the next house. But it is his own abode. I have nothing to do with it, nothing whatever. He is accountable for his own actions, and you will be accountable to him if you intrude upon his privacy. Release me, and I swear to conduct you to him. But you will take the consequences of your rashness upon yourself. I only go upon compulsion."

"I am ready to take any consequences," replied Leonard, resolutely.

"Come along, then," said Chowles, pointing down the passage.

"You mean us no mischief?" cried Leonard, suspiciously. "If you do, the attempt will cost you your life."

Chowles made no answer, but moved along the passage as quickly as Leonard, who kept fast hold of him, and walked by his side, would permit him. Presently, they reached a door, which neither the apprentice nor Rainbird had observed before. It admitted them into an extensive vault, at the further end of which was a short staircase, communicating with a passage that Leonard did not require to be informed was in another house.

Here Chowles paused.

"I think it right to warn you that you are running into a danger from which ere long you will be glad to draw back, young man," he said to the apprentice. "As a friend, I would advise you to proceed no further in the matter."

"Waste no more time in talking," cried Leonard, fiercely, and forcing him forward as he spoke. "Where is Nizza? Lead me to her without an instant's delay."

"A wilful man must have his way," returned Chowles, hurrying up the main staircase. "It is not my fault if any harm befalls you."

They had just gained the landing when a door on the right was suddenly thrown open, and Sir Paul Parravicin stood before them. He looked surprised and startled at the sight of the apprentice, and angrily demanded his business.

"I am come for Nizza Macasree," replied the apprentice, "whom you and your minion," pointing to Chowles, "have detained a captive against her will."

Parravicin glanced sternly and inquiringly at Chowles.

"I have protested to him that she is not here, Sir

Paul," said the latter, "but he will not believe me, and has compelled me, by threats of taking my life, to bring him and his companion to you."

"Then take them back again," rejoined Parravicin, "for I have nothing to say to them." And he turned haughtily upon his heel.

"That answer will not suffice, Sir Paul," said Leonard—"I will not depart without her."

"How!" exclaimed the Knight, drawing his sword. "Do you dare to intrude upon my presence. Begone, or I will punish your presumption." And he prepared to attack the apprentice.

"Advance a footstep," rejoined Leonard, who had never relinquished his grasp of Chowles, "and I pass my sword through this man's body. Speak, villain," he continued, in a tone so formidable that the coffin-maker shook with apprehension,—"is she here or not?"

Chowles gazed from him to the Knight, whose deportment was equally menacing, and appeared bewildered with terror.

"It is needless," said Leonard, "your looks answer for you. She is."

"Yes, yes, I confess she is," replied Chowles.

"You hear what he says, Sir Paul," remarked Leonard.

"His fears would make him assert anything," rejoined Parravicin. "If you do not depart instantly, I will drive you forth."

"Sir Paul Parravicin," rejoined Leonard, in an authoritative tone, "I command you, in the King's name, to deliver up this girl."

Parravicin laughed scornfully.

"The King has no authority here," he said.

"Pardon me, Sir Paul," rejoined Chowles, who began to be seriously alarmed at his own situation, and eagerly grasped at the first opportunity that offered of extricating himself from it,—"pardon me. If it is the King's pleasure she should be removed, it materially alters the case, and I can be no party to her detention."

"Both you and your employer will incur his Majesty's severest displeasure by detaining her after this notice," said Leonard.

"Before I listen to the young man's request, let him declare that it is his intention to deliver her up to the King," remarked Parravicin, coldly.

"It is my intention to deliver her up to one who has the best right to take charge of her," returned Leonard.

"You mean her father?" said Parravicin.

"Ay, but not the person you suppose to be her father," replied Leonard. "An important discovery has just been made respecting her parentage."

"Indeed!" exclaimed Parravicin, with a look of surprise.

"If I am not deceived, she owes her being to a gentleman named Thirlby," replied Leonard.

"What!" cried Parravicin, starting, and turning pale. "Did you say Thirlby?"

The apprentice replied in the affirmative.

Parravicin uttered a deep groan, and pressed his hand forcibly against his brow for some moments, during which the apprentice watched his countenance narrowly. He then controlled himself by a powerful effort, and returned his sword to its scabbard.

"Come into this room with me, young man," he said to the apprentice, "and let your companion remain outside with Chowles. Fear nothing. I am alone, and intend you no injury."

"I do not distrust you," replied Leonard, "and if I did, I should have no apprehension."

And signing to Rainbird to remain where he was, he entered the room with Parravicin, who instantly closed the door.

The Knight's first proceeding was to question him as to his reasons for supposing Nizza to be Thirlby's daughter, and clearly perceiving the deep interest his interrogator took in the matter, and the favourable change that had evidently been wrought in his sentiments, he did not think fit to hide anything from him. Parravicin's agitation increased as he listened to the recital; and at last, overcome by emotion, he sank into a chair, and covered his face with his hands. Recovering himself in a short time, he arose, and began to pace the chamber to and fro, as if uncertain how to act.

"What I have told you seems to have disturbed you, Sir Paul," said Leonard. "May I ask the cause of your emotion?"

"No, sir, you may not," replied Parravicin, angrily. And then suddenly checking himself, he added, with forced calmness—"And so you parted with Mr. Thirlby on London Bridge, and you think he will return to Doctor Hodges's residence in Watling-street."

"I am sure of it," replied Leonard.

"I must see him without delay," rejoined Parravicin.

"I will take you to him," said Leonard,—"but first you must take me to Nizza."

Parravicin walked to a table on which stood a small silver bell, and ringing it, the summons was immediately answered by an old woman. He was about to deliver a message to her, when the uneasy expression of her countenance struck him, and he hastily inquired what was the matter?

"You must not see the young lady to-night, Sir Paul," said the old woman.

"Why not?" demanded the Knight, hastily. "Why not?"

"Because—but you frighten me so that I dare not speak," she replied.

"I will frighten you still more if you keep me in this state of suspense," rejoined Parravicin, furiously.

"Is she ill?"

"I fear she has got the plague," returned the old woman. "Now you can see her if you think proper."

"I will see her," said Leonard. "I have no fears of infection."

The old woman looked hard at Parravicin, as if awaiting his orders.

"Yes, yes, you can take him to her room," said the Knight, "if he chooses to go thither. But why do you suppose it is the plague?"

"One cannot well be deceived in an attack of that nature," replied the old woman, shaking her head; "and I am sure I am not mistaken."

"Assistance must be procured," said Parravicin, who seemed completely overpowered by the intelligence he had just received. "Judith Malmayns could bring her through if she would, but I dare not trust her with her; and, indeed, the poor girl entertains so strong an aversion to her that I do not think she would suffer her to come near her."

"I am certain she would not," replied Leonard; "neither would I permit it. Doctor Hodges will attend her. He brought her through her former attack."

"I thought the disorder never attacked the same person twice," said Parravicin.

"I myself am an instance to the contrary," replied Leonard.

"And, as you have recovered, there may be a chance for Nizza," said Parravicin. "This old woman will take you to her. I will hasten to Doctor Hodges's residence, and if I should fail in meeting him will not rest till I procure assistance elsewhere. Do not leave her till I return."

Leonard readily gave a promise to the desired effect, and accompanying him to the door, told Rainbird what had happened. The latter agreed to wait below to render any assistance that might be required, and went down stairs with Parravicin and Chowles, who instantly quitted the house together, and hastened to Watling-street.

With a beating heart, Leonard then followed the old woman to Nizza's chamber. They had to pass through a small ante-room, the door of which was carefully locked. The suite of apartments occupied by the captive girl were exquisitely and luxuriously furnished, and formed a striking contrast to the rest of the house.

The air was loaded with perfumes; choice pictures adorned the walls; and the tables were covered with books and china ornaments. The windows, however, were strictly barred, and every precaution appeared to be taken to prevent an attempt at escape. Leonard cast an anxious look round as he entered the ante-room, and its luxurious air filled him with the utmost anxiety. His conductress, however, did not allow him to pause, but led him into another room, equally, if not more richly furnished than the first, and lighted by a large coloured lamp, which shed a warm glow on every object near it. An old dwarfed negro, in a fantastic dress, and with a large scimitar stuck in his girdle, stepped forward on their approach, and shook his head significantly.

"He is dumb," said the old woman, "but his gestures are easy to be understood. He means that Nizza is worse."

Leonard heaved a deep sigh.

Passing into a third room, they perceived the poor girl stretched on a couch placed in a recess at one side. She heard their footsteps, and without raising her head, or looking towards them, said, in a weak but determined voice—"Tell Sir Paul I will see him no more. The plague has again attacked me, and I am glad of it, for it will deliver me from his persecution. It will be useless to offer me any remedies, for I will not take them."

"It is not Sir Paul Parravicin," replied the old woman. "I have brought a stranger, with whose name I am unacquainted, to see you."

"Then you have done very wrong," replied Nizza. "I will see no one."

"Not even me, Nizza?" asked Leonard, advancing.

The poor girl started at the sound of his voice, and raising herself upon one arm, looked wildly towards him. As soon as she had satisfied herself that she had not been deceived by her fancy, she uttered a cry of delight, and falling backwards on the couch, became insensible.

CHAPTER XLII.

THIRLEY'S STORY.

LEONARD and the old woman instantly flew to the poor girl's assistance, and restoratives being applied, she speedily opened her eyes, and fixed them tenderly and inquiringly on the apprentice. Before replying to her mute interrogatories, Leonard requested the old woman to leave them,—an order very reluctantly obeyed,—and as soon as they were left alone, proceeded to explain to Nizza, as briefly as he could, the manner in which he had discovered her place of captivity. Nizza listened to his recital with the greatest interest, and though evidently suffering acute pain, uttered no complaint, but endeavoured to assume an appearance of composure and tranquillity.

"I must now tell you all that has befallen me," she said, as he concluded. "I will not dwell upon the persecution I endured from the King, whose passion increased in proportion to my resistance—I will not dwell upon the arts, the infamous arts, used to compel me to comply with his wishes—neither will I dwell upon the desperate measure I had determined to resort to, if driven to the last strait,—nor would I mention the subject at all, except to assure you I escaped contamination, where few escape it."

"You need give me no such assurance," remarked Leonard.

"While I was thus almost driven to despair," pursued Nizza, "a young female, who attended me, and affected to deplore my situation, offered to help me to escape. I eagerly embraced the offer, and one night, having purloined, as she stated, the key of the chamber in which I was lodged, she conducted me by a back staircase into the palace gardens. Thinking myself free, I warmly thanked my supposed deliverer, who checked me, and hurried towards a gate, at which she informed me a man was waiting to guide me to a cottage about a mile from the city, where I should be in perfect safety."

"I see the device," cried Leonard. "But why did you trust her?"

"What could I do?" rejoined Nizza. "To stay was as bad as to fly, and it might have proved worse. At all events, I had no distrust. My companion opened the gate, and called to some person without. It was profoundly dark, but I could distinctly perceive a carriage, or some other vehicle, at a little distance. Alarmed at the sight, I whispere my fears to my companion, and would have retreated, but she laid hold of my hand, and detained me. The next moment, I felt a rude grasp upon my arm. Before I could cry out, a hand was placed over my mouth so closely as almost to stifle me, and I was forced into the carriage by two persons, who seated themselves one on either side of me, threatening to put me to death if I made the slightest noise. The carriage was then driven off at a furious pace. For some miles, it pursued the high road, and then struck into a lane, where, in consequence of the deep and dangerous ruts, the driver was obliged to relax his speed. But in spite of all his caution, one of the wheels stuck in a hole, and in the efforts to extricate it, the carriage was overturned. No injury was sustained either by me, or by the others inside, and after the door being forced open without much difficulty, we were let out. One of my captors kept near me, while the other lent his assistance to the coachman to set the carriage to rights. It proved, however, to be so much damaged that it could not proceed, and after considerable delay, my conductors ordered the coachman to remain with it till further assistance could be sent; and taking the horses, one of them, notwithstanding my resistance, placed me beside him, and galloped off. Having ridden about five miles, we crossed an extensive common, and along an avenue of trees, which brought us to the entrance of an old house. Our arrival seemed to be expected, for the instant we appeared the gate was opened, and the old woman you have just seen, and who is called Mrs. Carteret, together with an African, named Hassan, appeared at it. Some muttered discourse passed between my conductors and these persons, which ended in my being committed to the care of Mrs. Carteret, who led me upstairs to a richly-furnished chamber, and urged me to take some refreshment before I retired to rest, which however I declined."

"Still, you saw nothing of Sir Paul Parravicin?" asked Leonard.

"On going down stairs next morn'g, he was the first person I beheld," replied Nizza. "He instantly fell upon his knees, and imploring my pardon for the artifice he had practised, said he had been compelled to have recourse to it in order to save me from the King. He then began to plead his own suit, but finding his protestations of passion of no effect, he became yet more importunate; when, at this juncture, one of the men who had acted as my conductors on the previous night, suddenly entered the room, and told him he must return to Oxford without an instant's delay, as the King's officers were in search of him. Casting a look upon one that made me tremble, he then departed; and though I remained more than a month in that house, I saw nothing more of him."

"Did you not attempt to escape during that time?" asked Leonard.

"I was so carefully watched by Mrs. Carteret and Hassan that it would have been vain to attempt it," she replied. "About a week ago, the two men who had conducted me to my place of captivity again made their appearance, and told me I must accompany them to London. I attempted no resistance, well aware it would be useless, and as the journey was made by bye-roads, three days elapsed before we reached the capital. We arrived at night, and I almost forgot my own alarm in the terrible sights I beheld at every turn. It would have been useless to call out for assistance, for there was no one to afford it. I asked my conductors if they had brought me there to die, and they answered sternly, 'It depended on myself.' At Ludgate, we met Chowles, the coffin maker, and he brought us to this house. Yesterday, Sir Paul Parravicin made his appearance, and told me he had brought me hither to be out of the King's way. He then renewed his odious solicitations. I resisted him as firmly as before, but he was more determined, and I might have been reduced to the last extremity, but for your arrival, or for the fell disorder that has seized me. But I have spoken enough of myself. Tell me what has become of Amabel?"

"She too has got the plague," replied Leonard, mournfully.

"Alas! alas!" cried Nizza, bursting into tears. "She is so dear to you, that I grieve for her far more than for myself."

"I have not seen her since I last beheld you," said Leonard, greatly touched by the poor girl's devotion. "She was carried off by the Earl of Rochester on the same night that you were taken from Kingston Lisle by the King."

"And she has been in his power ever since?" demanded Nizza, eagerly.

"I fear so," returned Leonard.

"The same Power that has watched over me I trust has protected her," cried Nizza, fervently.

"I cannot doubt it," replied Leonard. "Nay, I do not. She would not now be alive were it otherwise. But I have now something of importance to disclose to you. You remember the stranger we met near the plague pit in Finsbury-fields, whose child I buried?"

"Perfectly," replied Nizza.

"What if I tell you he is your father?" said Leonard.

"What!" cried Nizza, in the utmost surprise. "Have I then been mistaken all these years, in supposing the piper to be my father?"

"You have," replied Leonard. "I cannot explain more to you at present, but a few hours will reveal all. Thirlby is the name of your father. Have you ever heard it before?"

"Never," returned Nizza. "It is strange what you tell me. I have often reproached myself that I did not feel stronger affection towards the piper, who always treated me with the kindness of a parent, but it now seems that the true instinct was wanting. Tell me your reasons for supposing this gentleman to be my father."

As Leonard was about to reply, the door was opened by Mrs. Carteret, who said that Sir Paul Parravicin had just returned with Doctor Hodges and another gentleman. The words were scarcely uttered, when Thirlby rushed into the room, and flinging himself on his knees before the couch, cried—"At last I have found you,—my child! my child!"

The surprise which Nizza would have experienced at such an address was much lessened by what Leonard had just told her, and after earnestly regarding the stranger for some time, she exclaimed, in a gentle voice, "My father!"

Thirlby sprang on his feet, and would have folded her to his breast, if Doctor Hodges, who by this time had reached the couch, had not prevented him.

"Touch her not, or you destroy yourself," he cried.

"I care not if I do," rejoined Thirlby. "The gratification would be cheaply purchased at the price of my life, and if I could preserve hers by the sacrifice, I would gladly make it."

"No more of this," cried Hodges, impatiently, "or you will defeat any attempt I may make to cure her. You had better not remain here. Your presence agitates her."

Gazing wistfully at his daughter, and scarcely able to tear himself away, Thirlby yielded at last to the doctor's advice, and quitted the room. He was followed by Leonard, who received a hint to the same effect from Hodges. On reaching the adjoining room, they found Sir Paul Parravicin walking to and fro in an agitated manner. He immediately came up to Thirlby, and in an anxious but deferential tone, inquired how he had found Nizza. The latter shook his head, and sternly declining any further conversation, passed on with the apprentice into the outer room. He there flung himself into a chair, and appeared lost in deep and bitter reflection. Leonard was unwilling to disturb him, but at last his own anxieties compelled him to break silence.

"Can you tell me aught of Amabel?" he asked.

"Alas, no," replied Thirlby, rousing himself. "I have had no time to inquire about her, as you shall hear. After leaving you on the bridge, I went into Southwark, and hurrying through all the principal streets, gazing up at every window where there was a light, I inquired from every watchman I met whether he had seen any person answering to Doctor Hodges's description, but could hear nothing of him. At last, I gave up the quest, and retracing my steps, was proceeding along Cannon-street, when I descried a person a little in advance of me, whom I thought must be the doctor, and calling out to him, found I was not mistaken. I had just reached him when two other persons turned the corner of Nicholas-lane. On seeing us, one of them exclaimed, 'By heaven, the very person we want.' It was Sir Paul Parravicin, and he instantly explained his errand. Imagine the feelings with which I heard his account of the illness of my daughter,—of Nizza. Imagine, also, the horror I must have experienced in recognising in her persecutor my —."

The sentence was not completed, for at that moment the door was opened by Sir Paul Parravicin, who, advancing towards Thirlby, begged, in the same deferential tone as before, to have a few words with him.

"I might well refuse you," replied Thirlby, sternly, "but it is necessary we should have some explanation together."

"It is," rejoined Parravicin, "and, therefore, I have sought you."

Thirlby then arose, and accompanied the knight into the other room, closing the door after him. More than a quarter of an hour,—it seemed an age to Leonard,—elapsed, and still no one came. Listening intently, he heard voices in the next room. They were loud and angry as if in a quarrel. Then all was quiet, and at last Thirlby reappeared, and took a seat beside him.

"Have you seen Doctor Hodges?" inquired the apprentice, eagerly.

"I have," replied Thirlby—"and he speaks favourably of my poor child. He has administered all needful remedies, but, as it is necessary to watch their effect, he will remain with her some time longer."

"And, meanwhile, I shall know nothing of Amabel," cried Leonard, in a tone of bitter disappointment.

"Your anxiety is natural," returned Thirlby, "but you may rest satisfied, if Doctor Hodges has seen her, he has done all that human aid can effect. But as you must perforce wait his time, I will endeavour to beguile the tedious interval by relating to you so much of my history as refers to Nizza Macasree."

After a brief pause, he commenced:

"You must know, then, that in my youth I became desperately enamoured of a lady named Isabella Morley. She was most beautiful,—but I need not enlarge upon her attractions, since you have beheld her very image in Nizza. When I first met her, she was attached to another, but I soon rid myself of my rival. I quarrelled with him, and slew him in a duel. After a long and urgent suit, for the successful issue of which I was mainly indebted to my rank and wealth, which gave great influence with her parents, Isabella became mine. But I soon found she did not love me. In consequence of this discovery, I became madly jealous, and embittered her life and my own by my constant, and I now know too well, groundless suspicions. She had borne me a son, and in the excesses of my jealous jury, fancying the child was not my own, I threatened to put it to death. This violence led to the unhappy result I am about to relate. Another child was born—a daughter—need I say Nizza, or to give her her proper name, Isabella, for she was so christened after her mother. But to proceed. One night, maddened by some causeless doubt, I snatched the innocent babe from her mother's arms, and if I had not been prevented by the attendants, who rushed into the room on hearing their mistress's shrieks, should have destroyed her. After awhile I became pacified, and on reviewing my conduct more calmly, bitterly reproached myself, and hastened to express my penitence to my wife. 'You will never have an opportunity of repeating your violence,' she said. 'The object of your cruel and unfounded suspicions is gone.' 'Gone!' I exclaimed; 'whither?' And as I spoke, I looked around the chamber. But the babe was nowhere to be seen. In answer to my inquiries, my wife admitted she had caused her to be removed to a place of safety, but refused, even on my most urgent entreaties, accompanied by promises of amended conduct on my own part to tell me where. I next interrogated the servants, but they professed entire ignorance of the matter. For three whole days, I made ineffectual search for the child, and offered large rewards to any one who would bring her to me. But they failed to produce her; and repairing to my wife's chamber, I threatened her with the most terrible consequences if she persisted in her vindictive project. She defied me and, transported with rage, I passed my sword through her body, exclaiming, as I dealt the murderous blow, 'You have sent the brat to her father—to your lover, madam.' Horror and remorse seized me the moment I had committed this ruthless act, and I should have turned my sword against myself, if I had not been stayed by the cry of my poor victim, who implored me to hold my hand. 'Do not add crime to crime,' she cried; 'you have done me grievous wrong. I have not, indeed, loved you, because my affections were not under my control, but I have been ever true to you, and this I declare with my latest breath. I freely forgive you, and pray God to turn your heart.' And with these words she expired. I was roused from the stupefaction into which I was thrown by the appearance of the servants. Heaping execrations upon me, they strove to seize me, but I broke through them, and gained a garden at the back of my mansion, which was situated on the banks of the Thames, not far from Chelsea. This garden ran down to the river side, and was defended by a low wall, which I leaped, and plunged into the stream. A boat was instantly manned, and sent in pursuit of me, while a number of persons ran along the banks, all eager for my capture. But being an excellent swimmer, I contrived to elude them, though, as I never appeared again, it was supposed I was drowned."

"And Nizza, or as I ought now to call her, Isabella, was confided, I suppose, to the piper?" inquired Leonard.

"She was confided to his helpmate," replied Thirlby, "who had been nurse to my wife. Mike Macascree was one of my father's servants, and was in his younger days a merry, worthless fellow. The heavy calamity under which he now labours had not then befallen him. On taking charge of my daughter, his wife received certain papers substantiating the child's origin, together with a miniature, and a small golden amulet. The papers and miniature were delivered by her on her death-bed to the piper, who showed them to me to-night."

"And the amulet I myself have seen," remarked Leonard.

"To resume my own history," said Thirlby. "After the dreadful catastrophe I have related, I remained concealed in London for some months, and was glad to find the report of my death generally believed. I then passed over into Holland, where I remained for several years, in the course of which time I married the widow of a rich merchant, who died soon after our union, leaving me one child."

And he covered his hands to hide his emotion. After a while, he proceeded—

"Having passed many years as peacefully as one whose conscience was so heavily burdened as mine could hope to pass them in Amsterdam, I, last summer, brought my daughter, around whom my affections were closely twined, to London, and took up my abode in the eastern environs of the city. There again I was happy—too happy!—until at last the plague came. But why should I relate the rest of my sad story," he added, in a voice suffocated with emotion—"you know it as well as I do."

"You said you had a son," observed Leonard,—“Is he yet living?"

"He is," replied Thirlby, a shade passing over his countenance. "On my return to England, I communicated to him through Judith Malmayns, who is my foster-sister, that I was still alive, telling him the name I had adopted, and adding, I should never disturb him in the possession of his title and estates."

"Title!" exclaimed Leonard.

"Ay, title!" echoed Thirlby. "The title I once bore was that of Lord Argentine."

"I am glad to hear it," said Leonard, "for I began to fear Sir Paul Parravicin was your son."

"Sir Paul Parravicin, or, rather, the Lord Argentine, for such is his rightful title, is my son," returned Thirlby; "and I lament to own I am his father When among his worthless associates.—nay, even with the King,—he drops his higher title, and assumes that by which you have known him, and it is well he does so, for his actions are sufficient to tarnish a far nobler name than that he bears. Owing to this disguise, I knew not he was the person who had carried off my daughter. But, thank Heaven! another, and fouler crime, has been spared us. All these things have been strangely explained to me to-night. And thus you see, young man, the poor piper's daughter turns out to be the Lady Isabella Argentine."

Before an answer could be returned, the door was opened by Hodges, and both, starting to their feet, hurried towards him.

CHAPTER XLIII.

THE TRIALS OF AMABEL.

It will now be necessary to return to the period of Amabel's abduction from Kingston Lisle. The shawl thrown over her head prevented her cries from being heard, and notwithstanding her struggles, she was placed on horseback before a powerful man, who galloped off with her along the Wantage road. After proceeding at a rapid pace for about two miles, her conductor came to a halt, and she could distinguish the sound of other horsemen approaching. At first, she hoped it might prove a rescue. But she was quickly undeceived. The shawl was removed, and she beheld the Earl of Rochester, accompanied by Pillichody, and some half dozen mounted attendants. The Earl would have transferred her to his own steed, but she offered such determined resistance to the arrangement, that he was compelled to content himself with riding by her side. All his efforts to engage her in conversation were equally unsuccessful. She made no reply to his remarks; but averted her gaze from him, and whenever he approached, shrunk from him with abhorrence. The Earl, however, was not easily repulsed, but continued his attentions and discourse, as if both had been favourably received.

In this way they proceeded for some miles, one of the Earl's attendants, who was well acquainted with the country, being in fact a native of it, serving as their guide. They had quitted the Wantage-road, and leaving that ancient town, renowned as the birth-place of the great Alfred, on the right, had taken the direction of Abingdon and Oxford. It was a lovely evening, and their course led them through many charming places. But the dreariest waste would have been as agreeable as the richest prospect to Amabel. She noted neither the broad meadows yet white from the scythe, nor the corn-fields waving with their deep and abundant, though yet immature crops; nor did she cast even a passing glance at any of those green spots, which every lane offers, and upon which the eye of the traveller ordinarily delights to linger. She rode beneath a natural avenue of trees, whose branches met overhead like the arches of a cathedral, and was scarcely conscious of their pleasant shade. She heard neither the song of the wooing thrush, nor the cry of the startled blackbird, nor the evening hymn of the soaring lark. Alike to her was the gorse-covered common, along which they swiftly speeded, and the steep hill-side up which they more slowly mounted. She breathed not the delicious fragrance of the new-mown hay, nor listened to the distant lowing herds, the bleating sheep, or the cawing rooks. She thought of nothing but her perilous situation,—heard nothing but the voice of Rochester,—felt nothing but the terror inspired by his presence.

As the Earl did not desire to pass through any village if he could help it, his guide led them along the most unfrequented roads; but in spite of his caution, an interruption occurred which had nearly resulted in Amabel's deliverance. While threading a narrow lane, they came suddenly upon a troop of haymakers, in a field on the right, who up to that moment had been hidden from view by the high hedges. On seeing them, Amabel screamed loudly for assistance, and was instantly answered by their shouts. Rochester ordered his men to gallop forward, but the road winding round the meadow, the haymakers were enabled to take a shorter cut and intercept them. Leaping the hedge, a stout fellow rushed towards Amabel's conductor, and seized the bridle of his steed. He was followed by two others, who would have instantly liberated the captive girl, if the Earl had not, with great presence of mind, cried out—"Touch her not as you value your lives. She is ill of the plague."

At this formidable announcement, which operated like magic upon Amabel's defenders, and made them fall back more quickly than the weapons of the Earl's attendants could have done, they took to their heels, and communicating their fears to their comrades, who were breaking through the hedge in all directions, and hurrying to their aid, the whole band took to their heels, and regardless of Amabel's continued shrieks, never stopped till they supposed themselves out of reach of infection. The Earl was thus at liberty to pursue his way unmolested, and laughing heartily at the success of his stratagem, and at the consternation he had created among the haymakers, he pressed forward.

Nothing further occurred, till, in crossing the little river Ock near Lyford, the horse ridden by Amabel's conductor missed its footing, and precipitated them both into the water. No ill consequences followed the accident. Throwing himself into the shallow stream Rochester seized Amabel, and placed her beside him on his own steed. A deathly paleness overspread her countenance, and a convulsion shook her frame as she was thus brought into contact with the Earl, who fearing the immersion might prove dangerous in her present delicate state of health, quickened his pace to procure assistance. Before he had proceeded a hundred yards, Amabel fainted. Gazing at her with admiration, and pressing her inanimate frame to his breast, Rochester imprinted a passionate kiss on her cheek.

"By my soul," he mentally ejaculated; "I never thought I could be so desperately enamoured. I would not part with this girl for the crown of the realm."

While considering whither he should take her, and much alarmed at her situation, the man who acted as his guide, came to his relief. Halting till the Earl came up, he said—"If you want assistance for the young lady, my lord, I can take you to a good country inn not far from this, where she will be well attended to, and where, as it is kept by my father, I can answer for no questions being asked."

"Precisely what I wish, Sherborne," replied Rochester. "We will halt there for the night. Ride on as fast as you can."

Sherborne struck spurs into his steed, and passing Kingston Bagpuze, reached the high road between Abingdon and Faringdon, at the corner of which stood the inn in question,—a good-sized habitation, with large stables and a barn attached to it. Here he halted, and calling out in a loud and authoritative voice, the landlord instantly answered the summons, and on being informed by his son of the rank of his guest, doffed his cap, and hastened to assist the Earl to dismount. But Rochester declined his services, and bidding him summon his wife, a stout middle-aged dame shortly afterwards made her appearance. Committing Amabel to her care, the Earl then alighted, and followed them into the house.

The Plough, for so the inn was designated, was thrown into the utmost confusion by the arrival of the Earl and his suite. All the ordinary frequenters of the house were ejected, while the best parlour was instantly prepared for the accommodation of his lordship and Pillichody. But Rochester was far more anxious for Amabel than himself, and could not rest for a moment till assured by Dame Sherborne that she was restored to sensibility, and about to retire to rest. He then became easy, and sat down to supper with Pillichody. So elated was he by his success, that yielding to his natural inclination for hard drinking, he continued to revel so freely and so long with his follower, that day-break found them over their wine, the one toasting the grocer's daughter, and the other Patience, when they both staggered off to bed.

A couple of hours sufficed Rochester to sleep off the effects of his carouse. At six o'clock he arose, and ordered his attendants to prepare to set out without delay. When all was ready, he sent for Amabel, but she refused to come down stairs, and finding his repeated messages of no avail, he rushed into her room, and bore her, shrieking, to his steed.

In an hour after this they arrived at an old hall, belonging to the Earl, in the neighbourhood of Oxford. Amabel was entrusted to the care of a female attendant, and towards evening Rochester, who was burning with impatience for an interview, learnt, to his infinite disappointment, that she was so seriously unwell, that if he forced himself into her presence her life might be placed in jeopardy. She continued in the same state for several days, at the end of which time the surgeon who attended her, and who was a creature of the Earl's, pronounced her out of danger. Rochester then sent word by the female attendant, that he must see her in the course of that day, and a few hours after the delivery of the message, he sought her room. She was much enfeebled by illness, but received him with great self-possession.

"I cannot believe, my lord," she said, "that you desire to destroy me, and when I assure you, solemnly assure you, that if you continue to persecute me thus, my death will be the consequence, I am persuaded you will desist, and suffer me to depart."

"Amabel," rejoined the Earl, passionately,—"is it possible you can be so changed towards me? Nothing now interferes to prevent our union."

"Except my own determination to the contrary, my lord," she replied. "I can never be yours."

"Wherefore not?" asked the Earl, half angrily, half reproachfully.

"Because I know and feel that I should condemn myself to wretchedness," she replied. "Because,—for since your lordship will force the truth from me, I must speak out,—I have learnt to regard your character in its true light,—and because my heart is wedded to Heaven."

"Pshaw!" exclaimed the Earl, contemptuously; "you have been listening so long to your saintly father's discourses, that you fancy them applicable to yourself. But you are mistaken in me," he added, altering his tone, "I see where the main difficulty lies. You think I am about to delude you, as before, into a mock marriage. But I swear to you, you are mistaken. I love you so well that I would risk my temporal and eternal happiness for you. It will rejoice me to raise you to my own rank,—to place you among the radiant beauties of our sovereign's court, the brightest of whom you will outshine, and to devote my whole life to your happiness."

"It is too late," sighed Amabel.

"Why too late?" cried the Earl, imploringly. "We have gone through severe trials, it is true. I have been constantly baffled in my pursuit of you, but the disappointment has only made me love you more devotedly. Why too late? What is to prevent our nuptials from taking place to-day—to-morrow—when you will? The King himself shall be present at the ceremony, and shall give you away. Will this satisfy your scruples? I know I have offended you. I know I deserve your anger. But the love that prompted me to act thus, must also plead my pardon."

"Strengthen me!" murmured Amabel, looking supplicatingly upwards. "Strengthen me, for my trial is very sore."

"Be not deceived Amabel," continued Rochester, yet more ardently; "that you love me I am well assured, however strongly you may at this moment persuade yourself to the contrary. Be not governed by your father's strait-laced and puritanical opinions. Men like him cannot judge of fiery natures like mine. I myself have had to conquer a stubborn and rebellious spirit,—the demon pride. But I have conquered him. Love has achieved the victory,—love for you. I offer you my heart, my hand, my title. A haughty noble offers this to a grocer's daughter. Can you—will you refuse me?"

"I can and do, my lord," she replied. "I have achieved a yet harder victory. With me, principle has conquered love. I no longer respect you, no longer love you—and, therefore, cannot wed you."

"Rash and obstinate girl," said the Earl, unable to conceal his mortification; "you will bitterly repent your inconsiderate conduct. I offer you devotion such as no other man could offer you, and rank such as no other man is likely to offer you. You are now in my power, and you shall be mine,—in what way rests with yourself. You shall have a week to consider the matter. At the end of that time, I will again formally offer you my hand. If you accept it, well and good. If not, you know the alternative."

And without waiting for a reply, he quitted the room.

He was as good as his word. During the whole of the week allowed Amabel for consideration, he never intruded upon her, nor was his name at any time mentioned by her attendants. If she had been indeed Countess of Rochester, she could not have been treated with greater respect than was shown her. The apartment allotted her opened upon a large garden, surrounded by high walls, and she walked within it daily. Her serenity of mind remained undisturbed; her health visibly improved; and, what was yet more surprising, she entirely recovered her beauty. The whole of her time not devoted to exercise, was spent in reading, or in prayer.

On the appointed day, Rochester presented himself. She received him with the most perfect composure, and with a bland look, from which he augured favourably. He waved his hand to the attendants, and they were alone.

"I came for your answer, Amabel," he said; "but I scarcely require it, being convinced from your looks that I have nothing to fear. Oh! why did you not abridge this tedious interval? Why not inform me you had altered your mind? But I will not reproach you. I am too happy to complain of the delay."

"I must undeceive you, my lord," returned Amabel, gravely. "No change has taken place in my feelings. I still adhere to the resolution I had come to when we last parted."

"How!" exclaimed the Earl, his countenance darkening, and the evil look which Amabel had before noticed taking possession of it. "One moment lured on, and next rebuffed. But no—no," he added, constraining himself, "you cannot mean it. It is not in woman's nature to act thus. You have loved me—you love me still. Make me happy—make yourself happy."

"My lord," she replied, "strange and unnatural as my conduct may appear, you will find it consistent. You have lost the sway you once had over me, and for the reasons I have already stated, I can never be yours."

"Oh, recal your words, Amabel," cried the Earl, in the most moving tones he could command—"if you have no regard for me, at least have compassion. I will quit the court if you desire it; will abandon title, rank, wealth; and live in the humblest station with you. You know not what I am capable of when urged on by passion. I am capable of the darkest crimes, and of the highest virtues. The woman who has a man's heart in her power may mould it to her own purposes, be they good or ill. Reject me, and you drive me to despair, and plunge me into guilt. Accept me, and you may lead me into any course you please."

"Were I assured of this!" cried Amabel.

"Rest assured of it," returned the Earl, passionately. "Oh, yield to the impulses of natural affection, and do not suffer a cold and calculating creed to chill your better feelings. How many a warm and loving heart has been so frozen! Do not let yours be one of them. Be mine! be mine!"

Amabel looked at him earnestly for a moment, while, making sure he had gained his point, he could not conceal a slightly-triumphant smile.

"Now, your answer," he cried. "My life hangs upon it."

"I am still unmoved," she replied, coldly, and firmly.

"Ah!" exclaimed the Earl, with a terrible imprecation, and starting to his feet. "You refuse me. Be it so. But think not you shall escape. No, you are in my power, and I will use it. You shall be mine, and without the priest's interference. I will not degrade myself by an alliance with one so lowly born. The strongest love is nearest allied to hatred, and mine has become hatred—bitter hatred. You shall be mine, I tell you, and when I am become indifferent to you, I will cast you off. Then, when you are neglected, despised, shunned, you will regret—deeply but unavailingly,—your rejection of my proposals."

"No, my lord, I shall never regret it," replied Amabel, "and I cannot sufficiently rejoice that I did not yield to the momentary weakness that inclined me to accept them. I thank you for the insight you have afforded me into your character."

"You have formed an erroneous opinion of me, Amabel," cried the Earl, seeing his error, and trying to correct it, "I am well nigh distracted by my passion. Oh, forgive my violence;—forget it."

"Readily," she replied, "but think not I attach the least credit to your professions."

"Away then with further disguise," returned the Earl, relapsing into his furious mood, "and recognise in me the person I am,—or rather the person you would have me be. You say you are immoveable. So am I. Nor will I further delay my purpose."

Amabel, who had watched him uneasily during this speech, retreated a step, and taking a small dagger from a handkerchief in which she kept it concealed, placed its point against her breast.

"I well know whom I have to deal with, my lord," she said, "and am therefore provided against the last extremity. Attempt to touch me, and I plunge this dagger into my heart."

"Your sense of religion will not allow you to commit so desperate a deed," replied the Earl, derisively.

"My blood be upon your head, my lord," she rejoined, "for it is your hand that strikes the blow, and not my own. My honour is dearer to me than life, and I will unhesitatingly sacrifice the one to preserve the other. I have no fear but that the action, wrongful though it be, will be forgiven me."

"Hold!" exclaimed the Earl, seeing from her determined look and manner that she would unquestionably execute her purpose. "I have no desire to drive you to destruction. Think over what I have said to you, and we will renew the subject to-morrow."

"Renew it when you please, my lord, my answer will still be the same," she replied. "I have but one refuge from you—the grave; and thither, if need be, I shall fly."

And as she spoke, she moved slowly towards the adjoining chamber, the door of which she fastened after her.

"I thought I had some experience of her sex," said Rochester to himself, "but I find I was mistaken. To-morrow's mood, however, may be unlike to-day's. At all events, I must take my measures differently."

CHAPTER XLIV.

THE MARRIAGE AND ITS CONSEQUENCES.

UNWILLING to believe that he had become an object of aversion to Amabel, Rochester renewed his solicitations on the following day, and calling into play his utmost fascination of manner, endeavoured to remove any ill impression produced by his previous violence. She was proof, however, against his arts; and though he never lost his mastery over himself, he had some difficulty in concealing his chagrin at the result of the interview. He now began to adopt a different course, and entering into long discussions with Amabel, strove by every effort of wit and ridicule to shake and subvert her moral and religious principles. But here again he failed, and once more shifting his ground, affected to be convinced by her arguments. He entirely altered his demeanour, and though Amabel could not put much faith in the change, it was a subject of real rejoicing to her. Though scarcely conscious of it herself, he insensibly won upon her regards, and she passed many hours of each day in his society without finding it irksome. Seeing the advantage he had gained, and well aware that the slightest indiscretion would be fatal to his design, Rochester acted with the utmost caution. The more at ease she felt with him, the more deferential did he become, and before she was conscious of her danger, the poor girl was once more on the brink of the precipice.

It was about this time that Leonard Holt, as has been previously intimated, discovered her retreat, and contrived by clambering up a pear-tree which was nailed against the wall of the house, to reach her chamber window. Having received her assurance that she had resisted all the Earl's importunities, the apprentice promised to return on the following night with means to effect her liberation, and departed. Fully persuaded that she could now repose confidence in the Earl, Amabel acquainted him the next morning with Leonard's visit, adding that he would now have an opportunity of proving the sincerity of his professions by delivering her up to the apprentice.

"Since you desire it," replied the Earl, who heard her with an unmoved countenance, though internally torn with passion, "I will convey you to your father myself. I had hoped," he added with a sigh, "that we should never part again."

"I fear I have been mistaken in you, my lord," rejoined Amabel, half repenting her frankness.

"Not so," he replied. "I will do anything you require, except deliver you to this hateful apprentice. If it is your pleasure, I repeat, I will take you back to your father."

"Promise me this, my lord, and I shall be quite easy," cried Amabel, joyfully.

"I do promise it," he returned. "But oh! why not stay with me, and complete the good work you have begun?"

Amabel averted her head, and Rochester, sighing deeply, quitted the room. An attendant shortly afterwards came to inform her that it was the Earl's intention to start for London without delay, and begged her to prepare for the journey. In an hour's time a carriage drove to the door, and she was placed in it by Rochester, who, ordering a female attendant, named Prudence, who had recently had charge of her, to seat herself beside her, mounted his horse and set forth. Late on the second day they arrived in London. They passed through silent and deserted streets, the aspect of which struck terror into all the party, and proceeded towards the city. Presently, they reached Ludgate, but instead of proceeding to Wood-street, the carriage turned off on the right, and traversing Thames-street, crossed London-bridge. Amabel could obtain no explanation of this change from Prudence, and her uneasiness was not diminished when the vehicle, which was driven down a narrow street on the left, immediately after quitting the bridge, stopped at the entrance of a large court-yard. Rochester, who had already dismounted, assisted her to alight, and in answer to her hasty inquiries why he had brought her thither, told her he thought it better to defer taking her to her father till the morrow. Obligated to be content with this excuse, she was led into the house, severely reproaching herself for her indiscretion. Nothing, however, occurred to alarm her that night. The Earl was even more deferential than before, and assuring her he would fulfil his promise in the morning, confided her to Prudence.

The house whither she had been brought was large and old-fashioned. The rooms had once been magnificently fitted up, but the hangings and furniture were much faded, and had a gloomy and neglected air. This was especially observable in the sleeping chamber appointed for her reception. It was large and lofty, pannelled with black and shining oak, with a highly-polished floor of the same material, and was filled with cumbrous chests and cabinets, and antique high-backed chairs. But the most noticeable object was a large state bed, with a heavy square canopy, covered with the richest damask woven with gold, and hung with curtains of the same stuff, though now decayed and tarnished. A chill crept over Amabel as she gazed around.

"I cannot help thinking," she observed to Prudence,

"that I shall breathe my last in this room and in that bed."

"I hope not, madam," returned the attendant, unable to repress a shudder.

Nothing more was said, and Amabel retired to rest. But not being able to sleep, and having vainly tried to compose herself, she arose and opened the window. It was a serene and beautiful night, and she could see the smooth river sparkling in the starlight, and flowing at a hundred yards distance at the foot of the garden. Beyond, she could indistinctly perceive the outline of the mighty city, while nearer on the left lay the bridge, Solemnly across the water came the sound of innumerable bells, tolling for those who had died of the plague, and were now being borne to their last home. While listening to these sad sounds, another but more doleful and appalling noise caught her ears. It was the rumbling of cart-wheels in the adjoining street, accompanied by the ringing of a bell, while a hoarse voice cried "Bring out your dead! bring out your dead!" On hearing this cry, she closed the window and retired. Morning broke before sleep visited her weary eyelids, and then overcome by fatigue she dropped into a slumber, from which she did not awake until day was far advanced. She found Prudence sitting by her bedside, and alarmed by the expression of her countenance, anxiously inquired what was the matter?

"Alas, madam," replied the attendant, "the Earl has been taken suddenly ill. He set out for Wood-street the first thing this morning, and has seen your father, who refuses to receive you. On his return, he complained of a slight sickness, which has gradually increased in violence, and there can be little doubt it is the plague. Advice has been sent for. He prays you not to disturb yourself on his account, but to consider yourself sole mistress of this house, whatever may befall him."

Amabel passed a miserably anxious day. A fresh interest had been awakened in her heart in behalf of the Earl, and the precarious state in which she conceived him placed, did not tend to diminish it. She made many inquiries after him, and learned that he was worse, while the fearful nature of the attack could no longer be questioned. On the following day, Prudence reported that the distemper had made such rapid and terrible progress, that his recovery was considered almost hopeless.

"He raves continually of you, madam," said Prudence, "and I have no doubt he will die with your name on his lips."

Amabel was moved to tears by the information, and withdrawing into a corner of the room, prayed fervently for the supposed sufferer. Prudence gazed at her earnestly and compassionately, and muttering something to herself, quitted the room. The next day was the critical one (so it was said) for the Earl, and Amabel awaited in tearful anxiety the moment that was to decide his fate. It came, and he was pronounced out of danger. When the news was brought the anxious girl, she fainted.

A week passed, and the Earl continued to improve, and all danger of infection—if any such existed—being at an end, he sent a message to Amabel, beseeching her to grant him an interview in his own room. She willingly assented, and following the attendant, found him stretched upon a couch. In spite of his paleness and apparent debility, however, his good looks were but little impaired, and his attire, though negligent, was studiously arranged for effect. On Amabel's appearance, he made an effort to rise, but she hastened to prevent him. After thanking her for her kind inquiries he entered into a long conversation with her, in the course of which he displayed sentiments so exactly coinciding with her own that the good opinion she had already begun to entertain for him was soon heightened into the liveliest interest. They parted to meet again in the same way on the following day—and on the day following that. The bloom returned to the Earl's countenance, and he looked handsomer than ever. A week thus passed, and at the end of it, he said—"To-morrow I shall be well enough to venture forth again, and my first business shall be to proceed to your father, and see whether he is now able to receive you."

"The plague has not yet abated, my lord," observed Amabel, blushing.

"True," he replied, looking passionately at her. "Oh, forgive me, Amabel," he added, taking her hand, which she did not attempt to withdraw,—“forgive me, if I am wrong. But I now think your feelings are altered towards me, and that I may dare to hope you will be mine."

Amabel's bosom heaved with emotion. She tried to speak, but could not. Her head declined upon his shoulder, and she found relief in tears.

"I am answered," he cried, scarcely able to contain his rapture, and straining her to his bosom.

"I know not whether I am doing rightly," she murmured, gazing at him through her tears, "but I believe you mean me truly. God forgive you if you do not."

"Have no more doubts," cried the Earl. "You have wrought an entire change in me. Our union shall not be delayed an hour. It shall take place in Saint Saviour's to-night."

"Not to-night," cried Amabel, trembling at his eagerness—"to-morrow."

"To-night, to-night!" reiterated the Earl, victoriously. And he rushed out of the room.

Amabel was no sooner left to herself than she repented what she had done. "I fear I have made a false step," she thought, "but it is now too late to retreat, and I will hope for the best. He cannot mean to deceive me."

Her meditations were interrupted by the entrance of Prudence, who came towards her with a face beaming with delight.

"My lord has informed me of the good news," she said. "You are to be wedded to him to-day. I have expected it all along, but it is somewhat sudden at last. He is gone in search of the priest, and in the meantime has ordered me to attire you for the ceremony. I have several rich dresses for your ladyship—for so I must now call you—to choose from."

"The simplest will suit me best," replied Amabel; "and do not call me 'ladyship' till I have a right to the title."

"That will be so soon that I thought there could be no harm in using it now," returned Prudence. "But pray let me show you the dresses."

Amabel suffered herself to be led into another room, where she saw several sumptuous gowns, and selecting one of plain white, was soon arrayed in it by the officious attendant.

More than two hours elapsed before Rochester returned, when he entered Amabel's chamber, accompanied by Sir George Etherege and Pillichody. A feeling of misgiving crossed Amabel as she beheld his companions.

"I have had some difficulty in finding a clergyman," said the Earl, "for the rector of Saint Saviour's has fled from the plague. His curate, however, will officiate for him, and is now in the church."

Amabel fixed a searching look upon him.

"Why are these gentlemen here?" she asked.

"I have brought them with me," rejoined Rochester, "because as they were aware of the injury I once intended you, I wished them to be present at its reparation."

"I am satisfied," replied Amabel.

Taking her hand, the Earl then led her to a carriage, which conveyed them to Saint Saviour's. Just as they alighted, the dead-cart passed, and several bodies were brought towards it. Eager to turn her attention from the spectacle, Rochester hurried her into the old and beautiful church. In another moment, they were joined by Etherege and Pillichody, and they proceeded to the altar, where the priest, a young man, was standing. The ceremony was then performed, and the Earl led his bride back to the carriage. On their return, they were destined to another ill-omened interruption. The dead-cart was stationed near the gateway, and some delay occurred before it could be moved forward. Amabel, however, suffered no further misgiving to take possession of her. Deeming herself wedded to the Earl, she put no constraint on her affection for him, and her happiness, though short-lived, was deep and full.

A month passed away like a dream of delight. Nothing occurred in the slightest degree to mar her felicity. Rochester seemed only to live for her—to think only of her. At the end of this time, some indifference began to manifest itself in his deportment to her, and he evinced a disposition to return to the court and to its pleasures.

"I thought you had for ever abandoned them, my dear lord," said Amabel, reproachfully.

"For awhile I have," he replied, carelessly.

"You must leave me, if you return to them," she rejoined.

"If I must, I must," rejoined the Earl.

"You cannot mean this," she cried, bursting into tears. "You cannot be so changed."

"I have never changed since you first knew me," replied Rochester, derisively.

"Impossible!" she cried, in a tone of anguish, "you have not the faults,—the vices you once had."

"I know not what you call vices, madam," replied the Earl, sharply, "but I have the same qualities as ever."

"Am I to understand, then," cried Amabel, a fearful suspicion of the truth breaking on her mind, "that you never sincerely repented of your former actions?"

"You are," replied Rochester.

"And you deceived me when you said you did?"

"Precisely," he replied.

"I begin to suspect," she cried, with a look of horror and doubt, "that the attack of the plague was feigned."

"You are not far wide of the truth," was the reply.

"And our marriage?" she cried,—“our marriage? Was that feigned likewise?"

"It was," replied Rochester, calmly.

Amabel looked at him fixedly for a few minutes, as if she could not credit his assertion, and then receiving no contradiction, uttered a wild scream, and rushed out of the room. Rochester followed, and saw her dart with astonishing swiftness across the court-yard. On gaining the street, he perceived her flying figure already at some distance, and greatly alarmed, started in pursuit. The unfortunate girl was not allowed to proceed far. Two persons who were approaching, and who proved to be Etherage and Pillichody, caught hold of her, and detained her till Rochester came up. When the latter attempted to touch her, she uttered such fearful shrieks, that Etherage entreated him to desist. With some difficulty she was taken back to the house. But it was evident that the shock had unsettled her reason. She alternately uttered wild piercing screams, or broke into hysterical laughter. The Earl's presence so much increased her frenzy that he gladly withdrew.

"This is a melancholy business, my lord," observed Etherage, as they quitted the room together, "and I lament I had any share in it. We have both much to answer for."

"Do you think she will die?" rejoined Rochester.

"It would be well if she did," returned the other; "but I fear she will live to be a perpetual memento to you of the crime you have committed."

Amabel's delirium produced a high fever, which continued for three days. Her screams were at times so dreadful, that her betrayer shut himself up in the farthest part of the house in order not to hear them. When at last she sank into a sleep like that of death, produced by powerful opiates, he stole into the room, and gazed at her with feelings which those who watched his countenance did not envy. It was hoped by the surgeon who attended Amabel, that when the violence of the fever abated, her reason would be restored. But it was not so. Her faculties were completely shaken, and the cause of her affliction being effaced from her memory, she now spoke of the Earl of Rochester with the fondest affection.

Her betrayer once ventured into her presence, but he did not repeat it. Her looks and her tenderness were more than even his firmness could bear, and he hurried away to hide his emotion from the attendants. Several days elapsed, and as no improvement took place, the Earl, who began to find the stings of conscience too sharp for further endurance, resolved to try to deaden the pangs by again plunging into the dissipation of court. Prudence had been seized by the plague, and removed to the pest-house, and not knowing to whom to entrust Amabel, it at last occurred to him that Judith Malmayns would be a fitting person, and he accordingly sent for her from Saint Paul's, and communicated his wishes to her, offering her a considerable reward for the service. Judith readily undertook the office, and the Earl delayed his departure for two days to see how all went on, and finding the arrangement, to all appearances, answer perfectly, he departed with Etherage and Pillichody.

Ever since the communication of the fatal truth had been made to her by the Earl, his unfortunate victim had occupied the large oak-panelled chamber, on entering which so sad a presentiment had seized her; and she had never quitted the bed where she thought she would breathe her last. On the night of the Earl's departure, she made many inquiries concerning him from Judith Malmayns, who was seated in an old broad-cushioned, velvet-covered chair beside her, and was told that the King required his lordship's attendance at Oxford, but that he would soon return. At this answer, the tears gathered thickly in Amabel's dark eye-lashes, and she remained silent. By-and-by, she resumed the conversation.

"Do you know, nurse," she said, with a look of extreme anxiety, "I have forgotten my prayers. Repeat them to me, and I will say them after you."

"My memory is as bad as your ladyship's," replied Judith, contemptuously. "It is so long since I have said mine, that I have quite forgotten them."

"That is wrong in you," returned Amabel. "When I lived with my dear father, we had prayers morning and evening, and I was never so happy as then. I feel it would do me good if I could pray as I used to do."

"Well, well, all in good time," replied Judith. "As soon as you are better, you shall go back to your father, and then you can do as you please."

"No, no, I cannot go back to him," returned Amabel. "I am the Earl of Rochester's wife—his wedded wife. Am I not Countess of Rochester?"

"To be sure you are," replied Judith. "To be sure."

"I sometimes think otherwise," rejoined Amabel, mournfully. "And so my dear lord is gone to Oxford."

"He is," returned Judith, "but he will be back soon. And now," she added, with some impatience, "you have talked quite long enough. You must take your composing draught, and keep as tranquil as possible."

With this, she arose, and stepping to the table which stood by the side of the bed, filled a wine-glass with the contents of a silver flagon, and gave it to her.

Amabel drank the mixture, and complaining of its nauseous taste, Judith handed her a plate of fruit from the table to remove it. Soon after this, she dropped asleep, when the nurse arose, and taking a light from the table, cautiously possessed herself of a bunch of keys which were placed in a small pocket over Amabel's head, and proceeded to unlock a large chest that stood near the foot of the bed. She found it filled with valuables; with chains of gold, necklaces of precious stones, loops of pearl, diamond crosses, and other ornaments. Besides these, there were shawls and stuffs of the richest description. While contemplating these treasures, and considering how she could carry them off without alarming the household, she was startled by a profound sigh, and looking towards the bed, perceived, to her great alarm, that Amabel had opened her eyes, and was looking at her.

"What are you doing there, nurse?" she cried.

"Only looking at these pretty things, your ladyship," replied Judith.

"I hope you are not going to steal them?" said Amabel.

"Steal them!" echoed Judith, alarmed.—"What should make your ladyship think so?"

"I know not," said Amabel; "but put them back and bring the keys to me."

Judith feigned compliance, but long before she had restored the things to the chest, Amabel had again fallen asleep. Apprised by her tranquil breathing of this circumstance, Judith arose, and shading the candle with her hand, crept noiselessly towards the bed. Dark thoughts crossed her as she gazed at the unfortunate sleeper, and moving with the utmost caution, she set the light on the table, behind the curtains and had just grasped the pillow, with the intention of plucking it from under Amabel's head, and of smothering her with it, when she felt herself restrained by a powerful grasp, and turning beheld the Earl of Rochester.

CHAPTER XLV.

THE CERTIFICATE.

"WRETCH!" cried the Earl. "An instinctive dread that you would do her some injury brought me back, and I thank Heaven I have arrived in time to prevent your atrocious purpose."

"Your lordship would have acted more discreetly in staying away," replied Judith boldly; "and I would recommend you not to meddle in the matter, but to leave her to me. No suspicion shall alight on you, nor shall it even be known that her end was hastened. Leave the house as secretly as you came, and proceed on your journey with a light heart. She will never trouble you further."

"What!" exclaimed Rochester, who had been struck dumb for the moment by surprise and indignation, "do you imagine I would listen to such a proposal? Do you think I would sanction her murder?"

"I am sure you will, when you know as much as I do," replied Judith, calmly. "Hear me, my lord," she continued, drawing him to a little distance from the bed, and speaking in a deep low tone. "You cannot marry Mistress Mallet while this girl lives."

Rochester looked sternly and inquiringly at her.

"You think your marriage was feigned," pursued Judith; "that he was no priest who performed it; and that no other witnesses were present except Sir George Etherege and Pillichody. But you are mistaken. I and Chowles were present, and he who officiated was a priest. The marriage was lawful, and yon sleeping girl, who, but for your ill-timed interference, would ere this have breathed her last, is to all intents and purposes Countess of Rochester."

"A lie!" cried the Earl, furiously.

"I will soon prove it to be the truth," rejoined Judith. "Your retainer, and unscrupulous agent, Major Pillichody, applied to Chowles to find some one to personate a clergyman in a mock marriage which your lordship wished to have performed, and promised a handsome reward for the service. Chowles mentioned the matter to me, and we speedily contrived a plan to outwit your lordship, and turn the affair to our own advantage."

The Earl uttered an ejaculation of rage.

"Being acquainted with one of the minor canons of Saint Paul's, a worthy and pious young man, named Vincent," pursued Judith, utterly unmoved by Rochester's anger, "who resided hard by the cathedral, we hastened to him, and acquainted him with the design, representing ourselves as anxious to serve the poor girl, and defeat your lordship's wicked design,—for such we termed it. With a little persuasion Mr. Vincent consented to the scheme; Pillicbody was easily duped by Chowles's statement, and the ceremonial was fully performed."

"The whole story is a fabrication," cried the Earl, with affected incredulity.

"I have a certificate of the marriage," replied Judith, "signed by Mr. Vincent, and attested by Chowles and myself. If ever woman was wedded to man, Amabel is wedded to your lordship."

"If this is the case, why seek to destroy her?" demanded the Earl. "Her life must be of more consequence to you than her removal."

"I will deal frankly with you," replied Judith. "She discovered me in the act of emptying that chest, and an irresistible impulse prompted me to make away with her. But your lordship is in the right. Her life is valuable to me, and she shall live. But I repeat you cannot marry the rich heiress, Mistress Mallet."

"Temptress!" cried the Earl. "You put frightful thoughts into my head?"

"Go your ways," replied Judith, "and think no more about her. All shall be done that you require. I claim as my reward the contents of that chest."

"Your reward should be the gallows," rejoined the Earl indignantly. "I reject your proposal at once. Begone, wretch! or I shall forget you are a woman, and sacrifice you to my fury. Begone!"

"As your lordship pleases," she replied; "but first, the Countess of Rochester shall be made acquainted with her rights." So saying, she broke from him, and rushed to the bed.

"What are you about to do?" he cried.

"Waken her," rejoined Judith, slightly shaking the sleeper.

"Ah!" exclaimed Amabel, opening her eyes, and gazing at her with a bewildered and terrified look.

"His lordship is returned," said Judith.

"Indeed!" exclaimed Amabel, raising herself in the bed. "Where is he?—Ah, I see him.—Come to me, my dear lord," she added, stretching out her arms to him, "come to me."

But Rochester did not offer to stir.

"Oh! come to me, my lord," cried Amabel, in a troubled tone, "or I shall begin to think that my dream is true, and that I am not wedded to you."

"It was merely a dream, your ladyship," observed Judith. "I will bear witness that you are wedded to his lordship, for I was present at the ceremony."

"I did not see you," said Amabel.

"I was there nevertheless," replied Judith.

"I am sorry to hear it," rejoined Amabel.

"Your ladyship would be of a different opinion if you knew all," returned Judith, significantly.

"Why so?" inquired the other, curiously.

"Because the clergyman who married you is dead of the plague," returned Judith; "and it may chance in these terrible times that the two gentlemen who were present at the ceremony may die of the same distemper, and then there will be no one left but me and another person to prove that your marriage was lawful."

"But its lawfulness will never be questioned, my dear lord, will it?" asked Amabel, looking beseechingly at Rochester.

"Never," replied Judith, producing a small piece of parchment, "while I hold this certificate."

"Give me that document," said the Earl, in an under tone to her.

Judith glanced towards the chest.

"It is yours," said the Earl, in the same tone as before.

"What are you whispering to her, my lord?" inquired Amabel, uneasily.

"I am merely telling her to remove that chest, sweetheart," he replied.

"Do not send it away," cried Amabel. "It contains all the ornaments and trinkets you have given me. Do you know," she added in a whisper, "I caught her looking into it just now, and I suspect she was about to steal something."

"Pshaw!" cried the Earl—"she acted by my directions. Take the chest away," he added to Judith.

"Has your lordship no further orders?" she rejoined, significantly.

"None whatever," he replied, with a frown.

"Before you go, give me the certificate," cried Amabel. "I must have it."

Judith pretended not to hear her.

"Give it her," whispered the Earl; "I will remove it when she falls asleep."

Nodding acquiescence, Judith took the parchment from her bosom, and returned to the bed. While this was passing, the Earl walked towards the chest, and cast his eye over such of its contents as were scattered upon the floor. Judith watched him carefully, and when his back was turned, drew a small lancet, and affecting to arrange her dress, slightly punctured Amabel's neck. The pain was trifling, but the poor girl uttered a cry.

"What is the matter?" cried the Earl, turning suddenly round.

"Nothing—nothing," replied Judith; "a pin in my sleeve pricked her as I was fastening her cap, that was all. Her death is certain," she added to herself, "she is inoculated with the plague-venom."

She then went to the chest, and replacing everything within it, removed it by the help of the Earl of Rochester into the adjoining room.

"I will send for it at midnight," she said.

"It shall be delivered to your messenger," rejoined the Earl; "but you will answer for Chowles's secrecy?"

"I will," returned Judith, with a meaning smile. "But you may take my word for it you will not be troubled long with your wife. If I have any judgment respecting the plague, she is infected."

"Indeed!" cried Rochester,—"then—" but he checked himself, and added, "I do not believe it. Begone."

"He does believe it for all that," muttered Judith, as she sunk away.

Rochester returned to Amabel, and sat by her until she fell asleep, when he took the parchment from beneath the pillow where she had placed it. Examining it, he found it, as Judith had stated, a certificate of his marriage, signed by Mark Vincent, the clergyman who had officiated, and duly attested. Having carefully perused it, he held it towards the taper, with the intention of destroying it.

As he was about to perpetrate this unworthy action, he looked towards the bed. The soft sweet smile that played upon the sleeper's features turned him from his purpose. Placing the parchment in his doublet, he left the room, and summoning a female attendant, alleged some excuse for his unexpected return, and ordered her to watch by the bedside of her mistress. Giving some further directions, he threw himself upon a couch, and sought a few hours' repose. At daybreak, he repaired to Amabel's chamber, and finding her wrapped in a peaceful slumber, he commended her to the attendant, and departed.

On awaking, Amabel complained of an uneasy sensation on her neck, and the attendant, examining the spot, found to her great alarm a small red pustule. Without making a single observation, she left the room, and despatched a messenger after the Earl of Rochester to acquaint him that the Countess was attacked by the plague. Such was the terror inspired by this dread disorder that the moment it was known that Amabel was attacked by it, the whole household, except an old woman, fled. This old woman, whose name was Batley, and who acted as the Earl's housekeeper, took upon herself the office of nurse. Before evening, the poor sufferer, who had been enduring great agony during the whole of the day, became so much worse, that Mrs. Batley ran out in search of assistance. She met with a watchman who told her that a famous apothecary, from Clerkenwell, named Sibbald, who was celebrated for the cures he had effected, had just entered a neighbouring house, and offered to await his coming forth, and send him to her.

Thanking him, Mrs. Batley returned to the house, and presently afterwards, Sibbald made his appearance. His looks and person had become even more repulsive than formerly. He desired to be led to the patient, and on seeing her shook his head. He examined the pustule, which had greatly increased in size, and turning away, muttered "I can do nothing for her."

"At least make the attempt," implored Mrs. Batley. "She is the Countess of Rochester. You shall be well rewarded—and if you cure her, the Earl will make your fortune."

"If his lordship would change stations with me, I could not cure her," replied Sibbald. "Let me look at her again," he added, examining the pustule. "There is a strange appearance about this tumour. Has Judith Malmayns attended her?"

"She was here yesterday," replied Mrs. Batley.

"I thought so," he muttered. "I repeat it is all over with her."

And he turned to depart.

"Do not leave her thus, in pity do not," cried the old woman, detaining him. "Make some effort to save her. My lord loves her to distraction, and will abundantly reward you."

"All I can do is to give her something to allay the pain," returned Sibbald.

And drawing a small phial from his doublet, he poured its contents into a glass, and administered it to the patient.

"That will throw her into a slumber," he said, "and when she wakes, she will be without pain. But her end will not be far off."

Mrs. Batley took a purse from a drawer in one of the cabinets, and gave it to the apothecary, who bowed and retired. As he had foretold, Amabel fell into a heavy lethargy, which continued during the whole of the night. Mrs. Batley, who had never left her, noticed that an extraordinary and fearful change had taken place in her countenance, and she could not doubt that the apothecary's prediction would be realized. The tumour had increased in size, and was surrounded by a dusky brown circle, which she knew to be a bad sign. The sufferer's eyes, when she opened them, and gazed around, had a dim and glazed look. But she was perfectly calm and composed, and as had been prognosticated, free from pain. She had, also, fully regained her faculties, and seemed quite aware of her dangerous situation.

But the return of reason brought with it no solace. On the contrary, the Earl's treachery rushed upon her recollection, and gave her infinitely more anguish than the bodily pain she had recently endured. She bedewed the pillow with her tears, and fervently prayed for forgiveness for her involuntary fault. Mrs. Batley was deeply moved by her affliction, and offered her every consolation in her power.

"I would the plague had selected me for a victim instead of your ladyship," she said. "It is hard to leave the world at your age, possessed of beauty, honours, and wealth; but at mine, it would not signify."

"You mistake the cause of my grief," returned Amabel; "I do not lament that my hour is at hand, but—" and her emotion so overpowered her that she could not proceed.

"Do not disturb yourself further, dear lady," rejoined the old woman. "Let the worst happen, I am sure you are well prepared to meet your Maker."

"I once was," replied Amabel, in a voice of despair, "but now—oh, Heaven forgive me!"

"Shall I fetch some holy minister to pray beside you, my lady?" said the old Mrs. Batley,—"one to whom you can pour forth the sorrows of your heart?"

"Do so! oh, do!" cried Amabel, "and do not call me lady. I am not worthy to be placed in the same rank as yourself."

"Her wits are clean gone," muttered Mrs. Batley, looking at her compassionately.

"Heed me not," said Amabel; "but if you have any pity for the unfortunate, do as you have promised."

"I will,—I will," said Mrs. Batley, departing.

Half an hour, which scarcely seemed a moment to the poor sufferer, who was employed in fervent prayer, elapsed before Mrs. Batley returned. She was accompanied by a tall man, whom Amabel recognized as Solomon Eagle.

"I have not been able to find a clergyman," said the old woman, "but I have brought a devout man who is willing to pray with you."

"Ah!" exclaimed the enthusiast, starting as he beheld Amabel. "Can it be Mr. Bloundel's daughter?"

"It is," returned Amabel, with a groan. "Leave us, my good woman," she added to Mrs. Batley; "I have something to impart to Solomon Eagle which is for his ear alone."

The old woman instantly retired, and Amabel briefly related her hapless story to the enthusiast.

"May I hope for forgiveness?" she inquired, as she concluded.

"Assuredly," replied Solomon Eagle, "assuredly! You have not erred wilfully, but through ignorance, and therefore you have committed no offence. You will be forgiven,—but woe to your deceiver, here and hereafter."

"Oh! say not so," she cried. "May Heaven pardon him, as I do. While I have strength left, I will pray for him."

And she poured forth her supplications for the Earl in terms so earnest and pathetic that the tears were called to Solomon Eagle's eyes, and flowed down his rough cheek. At this juncture, hasty steps were heard in the adjoining passage, and the door opening, admitted the Earl of Rochester, who rushed towards the bed.

"Back!" cried Solomon Eagle, pushing him forcibly aside. "Back!"

"What do you here?" cried Rochester, fiercely.

"I am watching over the death-bed of your victim," returned Solomon Eagle. "Retire, my lord. You disturb her."

"Oh, no," returned Amabel, meekly. "Let him come near me." And as Solomon Eagle drew a little aside, and allowed the Earl to approach, she added, "With my latest breath I forgive you, my lord, for the wrong you have done me, and bless you."

The Earl tried to speak, but his voice was suffocated by emotion. As soon as he could find words, he said, "Your goodness completely overpowers me, dearest Amabel. Heaven is my witness, that even now I would make you all the atonement in my power, were it needful. But it is not so. The wrong I intended you was never committed. I myself was deceived. I intended a feigned marriage, but it was rightfully performed. It is needless to enter into further particulars of the unhappy transaction, but you may credit my assertion when I tell you you are indeed my wife, and Countess of Rochester."

"If I thought so, I should die happy," replied Amabel.

"Behold this proof!" said Rochester, producing the certificate.

"I cannot read it," replied Amabel. "But you could not have the heart to deceive me now."

"I will read it, and you well know I would not deceive you," cried Solomon Eagle, casting his eye over it. "His lordship has avouched the truth," he continued. "It is a marriage-certificate, duly signed and attested."

"God be thanked!" ejaculated Amabel, fervently. "God be thanked! You have been spared that guilt, and I shall die content."

"I trust your life will long be spared," rejoined the Earl.

Amabel shook her head.

"There is but one man in this city who could save her," whispered Solomon Eagle, "and I doubt even his power to do so."

"Who do you mean?" cried Rochester, eagerly.

"Doctor Hodges," replied the enthusiast.

"I know him well," cried the Earl. "I will fly to him instantly. Remain with her till I return."

"My lord—my dear lord," interposed Amabel, faintly, "you trouble yourself needlessly. I am past all human aid."

"Do not despair," replied the Earl. "Many years of happiness are, I trust, in store for us. Do not detain me. I go to save you. Farewell for a short time."

"Farewell, for ever, my lord," she said, gently pressing his hand. "We shall not meet again. Your name will be coupled with my latest breath."

"I shall be completely unmanned if I stay here a moment longer," cried the Earl, breaking from her, and rushing out of the room.

As soon as he was gone, Amabel addressed herself once more to prayer with Solomon Eagle, and in this way an hour was passed. The Earl not returning at the end of that time, Solomon Eagle became extremely uneasy, every moment being of the utmost consequence, and summoning Mrs. Batley, committed the patient to her care, and set off in search of Hodges. He hastened to the Doctor's house—he was absent; to the cathedral—he was not there; but he learned that a person answering to the Earl's description had been making similar inquiries after him. At last, one of the surgeon's assistants told him that he thought the Doctor was gone towards Cornhill, and hoping accidentally to meet with him, the enthusiast set off in that direction. While passing near the Exchange, he encountered Leonard, as before related, but did not think fit to acquaint him with more than Amabel's dangerous situation, but he had reason to regret making the communication at all, on finding its effect upon the poor youth. There was, however, no help for it, and placing him in what appeared a situation of safety, he left him.

Rochester, meanwhile, had been equally unsuccessful in his search for Hodges. Hurrying first in one direction and then in another, at the suggestion of the surgeon's assistant, he at last repaired to the Doctor's residence, determined to await his return. In half an hour he came, and received the Earl, as the old porter stated to Thirlby and Leonard, with angry astonishment. As soon as they were alone, the Earl told him all that had occurred, and besought him to accompany him to the poor sufferer.

"I will go to her," said Hodges, who had listened to the recital with mixed feelings of sorrow and indignation, "on one condition—and one only—namely, that your lordship does not see her again without my permission."

"Why do you impose this restriction upon me, sir?" demanded Rochester.

"I do not think it necessary to give my reasons," returned Hodges; "but I will only go upon those terms."

"Then I must perforce submit," replied the Earl, "but I must entreat you to set forth without a moment's delay, or you will be too late."

"I will follow you instantly," rejoined Hodges. "Your lordship can wait for me at the Southwark side of the bridge." He then opened the door, recapitulating the terms upon which alone he would attend, and the Earl departed.

Shortly afterwards he set out, and making the best of his way, found Rochester at the appointed place. The latter conducted him to the entrance of the habitation, and indicating a spot where he would remain till his return, left him.

CHAPTER XLVI.

DEATH OF AMABEL.

HODGES soon found his way to the chamber of the sufferer, and at once perceived that all human aid was vain. She exhibited much pleasure at seeing him, and looked round, as if in search of the Earl. Guessing her meaning, the physician, who now began to regret the interdiction he had placed upon him, told her that he was the cause of his absence.

"It is well," she murmured,—"well."

She then made some inquiries after her relatives, and receiving a satisfactory answer, said, "I am glad you are come. You will be able to tell my father how I died."

"It will be a great comfort to him to learn the tranquil frame in which I have found you," replied Hodges.

"How long have I to live?" asked Amabel, somewhat quickly. "Do not deceive me."

"You had better make your preparations without delay," returned Hodges.

"I understand," she replied. And joining her hands upon her breast, she began to murmur a prayer.

Hodges, who up to this moment had had some difficulty in repressing his emotion, withdrew to a short distance to hide his fast-falling tears. He was roused shortly after by a sudden and startling cry from the old woman.

"Oh, sir, she is going! she is going!" ejaculated Mrs. Batley.

He found the exclamation true. The eyes of the dying girl were closed. There was a slight quiver of the lips, as if she murmured some name—probably Rochester's,—and then all was over.

Hodges gazed at her sorrowfully for some time. He then roused himself, and giving some necessary directions to the old woman respecting the body, quitted the house. Not finding the Earl at the place he had appointed to meet him, after waiting for a short time, he proceeded towards his own house. On the way, he was met by Thirlby and Parravicin, as previously related, and conducted to the house in Nicholas-lane. It will not be necessary to recapitulate what subsequently occurred. We shall, therefore, proceed to the point of time when he quitted his new patient, and entered the room where Thirlby and Leonard were waiting for him. Both, as has been stated, rushed towards him, and the former eagerly asked his opinion respecting his daughter.

"My opinion is positive," replied Hodges. "With care, she will undoubtedly recover."

"Heaven be thanked!" cried Thirlby, dropping on his knees.

"And now, one word to me, sir," cried Leonard. "What of Amabel?"

"Alas!" exclaimed the Doctor, "she is no more."

"Dead!" shrieked Leonard.

"Ay, dead!" repeated the Doctor. "She died of the plague to-night."

He then proceeded to detail briefly all that had occurred. Leonard listened like one stupefied, till he brought his recital to a close, and then asking where the house in which she had died was situated, rushed out of the room, and made his way, he knew not how, into the street. His brain seemed on fire, and he ran so quickly, that his feet appeared scarcely to touch the ground. A few seconds brought him to London-bridge. He crossed it, and turning down the street on the left, was nearing the house to which he had been directed, when his career was suddenly checked. The gate of the court-yard was opened, and two men, evidently from their apparel buriers of the dead, issued from it. They carried a long narrow board between them, and on it was placed a body wrapped in a white sheet. A freezing horror rooted Leonard to the spot where he stood. He attempted to move, but could not; neither could he utter a cry.

The men proceeded with their burthen towards the adjoining habitation, which was marked with the fatal red cross and inscription. Before it stood the dead-cart, partly filled with corpses. The foremost burier carried a lantern, but he held it so low that its light did not fall upon his burthen. Leonard, however, did not require to see the body to know whose it was.

The moon was at the full, and shed a ghastly light over the group, while a large bat, wheeling in narrow circles round the dead-cart, added to the horror of the scene.

On reaching the door of the house, the burier set down the lantern near the body of a young man which had just been thrust forth. At the same moment, Chowles, with a lantern in his hand, stepped out upon the threshold.

"Who have you got, Jonas?" he asked.

"I know not," replied the hindmost burier. "We entered yonder large house, the door of which was open, and in one of the rooms we found an old woman in a fainting state, and the body of this young girl wrapped in a sheet, and ready for the cart. So we clapped it on the board, and brought it away with us."

"You did right," replied Chowles. "I wonder who it is."

As he spoke, he held up his lantern, and unfastening it, the light fell upon a face that Leonard knew too well. Oh! to see it thus! The features were pale as marble; calm in their expression, and like those of one wrapped in placid slumber. The long fair hair hung over the side of the board. It was a sad and touching sight.

"Why, as I am a living man, it is the grocer's daughter, Amabel,—somewhile the Countess of Rochester," remarked Chowles.

"It is, it is!" cried the Earl of Rochester, suddenly rushing forward. "Whither are you about to take her? Set her down—set her down!"

"Hinder them not, my lord," cried another person, also appearing on the scene with equal suddenness. "Place her in the cart," cried Solomon Eagle—for he it was—to the carriers. "This is a just punishment to you, my lord," he added to Rochester, as his injunctions were obeyed—"oppose them not in their duty."

It was not in the Earl's power to do so. Like Leonard, he was transfixed with horror. The other bodies were soon placed in the cart, and it was put in motion.

At this juncture, the apprentice's suspended faculties were for an instant,—and an instant only,—restored to him. He uttered a piercing cry, and staggering forward, fell senseless on the ground.

BOOK THE FIFTH.

CHAPTER XLVII.

THE DECLINE OF THE PLAGUE.

More than two months must be passed over in silence. During that time, the pestilence had so greatly abated as no longer to occasion alarm to those who had escaped its ravages. It has been mentioned that the distemper arrived at its height about the 10th of September, and though for the two following weeks the decline was scarcely perceptible, yet it had already commenced. On the last week in that fatal month, when all hope had been abandoned, the Bills of Mortality suddenly decreased in number one thousand eight hundred and thirty-four. And this fortunate change could not be attributed to the want of materials to act upon, for the sick continued as numerous as before, while the deaths were less frequent. In the next week, there was a further decrease of six hundred; in the next after that, of six hundred; and so on till the end of October, when the cold weather setting in, the amount was reduced to nearly a thousand.

At first, when the distemper began to lose somewhat of its malignancy, a few scared individuals appeared in the streets, but carefully shunned each other. In a few days, however, considerable numbers joined them, and for the first time for nearly three months, there was something like life abroad. It is astonishing how soon hope and confidence are revived. Now that it could no longer be doubted that the plague was on the decline, it seemed as if a miracle had been performed in favour of the city. Houses were opened—shopkeepers resumed their business—and it was a marvel to every one that so many persons were left alive. Dejection and despair of the darkest kind were succeeded by frenzied delight, and no bound was put to the public satisfaction. Strangers stopped each other in the streets, and conversed together like old friends. The bells that had grown hoarse with tolling funerals, were now cracked with joyous peals. The general joy extended even to the sick, and many, buoyed up by hope, recovered, when in the former season of despondency they would inevitably have perished. All fear of the plague seemed to have vanished with the flying disorder. Those who were scarcely out of danger joined in the throng, and it was no uncommon sight to see men with bandages round their necks, or supported by staves and crutches, shaking hands with their friends, and even embracing them.

The consequence of this incautious conduct may be easily foreseen. The plague had received too severe a check to burst forth anew, but it spread further than it might otherwise have done, and attacked many persons who, but for their own imprudence, would have escaped. Amongst others, a barber in Saint Martin's-le-Grand, who had fled into the country in August, returned to his shop in the middle of October, and catching the disorder from one of his customers, perished with the whole of his family.

But these, and several other equally fatal instances, produced no effect on the multitude. Fully persuaded that the virulence of the disorder was exhausted, as indeed it appeared to be, they gave free scope to their satisfaction, which was greater than was ever experienced by the inhabitants of a besieged city, reduced by famine to the last strait of despair, and suddenly restored to freedom and plenty. The more pious part of the community thronged to the churches, from which they had been so long absent, and returned thanks for their unexpected deliverance. Others, who had been terrified into seriousness and devotion, speedily forgot their former terrors, and resuming their old habits, derided those who were grateful for their preservation. Profaneness and debauchery again prevailed, and the taverns were as well filled as the churches. Solomon Eagle continued his midnight courses through the streets, but he could no longer find an audience as before. Those who listened to him only laughed at his denunciations of a new judgment, and told him his preachings were now completely out of date.

By this time numbers of those who had quitted London having returned to it, the streets began to resume their wonted appearance. The utmost care was taken by the authorities to cleanse and purify the houses, in order to remove all chance of keeping alive the infection. Every room in every habitation where a person had died of the plague,—and there were few that had escaped the visitation,—were ordered to be white-washed, and the strongest fumigations were employed to correct the pestilential effluvia. Brimstone, resin, and pitch were burnt in the houses of the poor: ben-jamin, myrrh, and other more expensive perfumes in the houses of the rich; while vast quantities of powder were consumed in creating blasts to carry off the foul air. Large and constant fires were kept in all the houses, and several were burnt down in consequence of the negligence of their owners.

All goods, clothes, and bedding capable of harbouring infection, were condemned to be publicly burned, and vast bonfires were lighted in Finsbury-fields and elsewhere, into which many hundred cart-loads of such articles were thrown. The whole of Chowles's hoard, except the plate, which he managed to carry off and conceal in certain hiding-places in Saint Paul's, were taken from the house in Nicholas-lane, and cast into the fire.

The cathedral was one of the first places ordered to be purified. The pallets of the sick were removed and burned, and all the stains and impurities with which its floor and columns were polluted were cleansed. Nothing was left untried to free it from infection. It was washed throughout with vinegar, fumigated with the strongest scents, and several large barrels of pitch were burnt in the aisles.

"It shall undergo another species of purification," said Solomon Eagle, who was present during these proceedings; "one that shall search every nook within it—shall embrace all those columns, and pierce every crack and crevice in these ornaments,—and then, and not till then, will it be thoroughly cleansed."

During all this time, the grocer had not opened his dwelling. The wisdom of his plan was now fully approved. The plague was declining fast, and not an inmate of his house had been attacked by it. Soon after the melancholy occurrence, he had been informed by Doctor Hodges of Amabel's death, but the humane physician concealed from him the painful circumstances under which it took place. It required all Mr. Bloundel's fortitude to support him under the shock occasioned by this intelligence, and he did not communicate the afflicting tidings to his wife, until he had prepared her for their reception. But she bore them better than he had anticipated, and though she mourned her daughter deeply and truly, she appeared completely resigned to the loss. Sorrow pervaded the whole household for some weeks, and the grocer, who never relaxed his system, shrouded his sufferings under the appearance of additional austerity of manner. It would have been a great consolation to him to see Leonard Holt, but the apprentice had disappeared, and even Doctor Hodges could give no account of him.

One night, in the middle of November, the grocer signified to his wife his intention of going forth early on the following morning to satisfy himself that the plague was really abating. Accordingly, after he had finished his devotions and broken his fast, he unbarred the street door, and went forth. His first act on locking the door behind him, which he did as a measure of precaution, was to fall on his knees, and offer up his prayers to heaven for his signal preservation. He then arose, and stepping into the middle of the street, gazed at the habitation which had formed his prison and refuge for nearly six months. There it was, with its shutters closed and barred—a secure asylum, with all alive within it, while every other dwelling in the street was desolate.

The grocer's sensations were novel and extraordinary. His first impulse was to enjoy his newly-recovered freedom, and put himself into active motion. But he checked the feeling as sinful, and proceeded along the street at a slow pace. He did not meet a single person until he reached Cheapside, where he found matters completely changed. Several shops were already opened, and there were a few carts and other vehicles tracking their way through the broad and yet grass-grown street. It was a clear frosty morning, and there was a healthful feel in the bracing atmosphere that produced an exhilarating effect on the spirits. The grocer pursued his course through the middle of the street, carefully avoiding all contact with such persons as he encountered, though he cordially returned their greetings, and wandered on, scarcely knowing whither he was going, but deeply interested in all he beheld.

The aspect of the city was indeed most curious. The houses were for the most part unoccupied—the streets overgrown with grass—while every object, animate and inanimate, bore some marks of the recent visitation. Still, all looked hopeful, and the grocer could not doubt that the worst was past. The different demeanour of the various individuals he met struck him. Now he passed a young man whistling cheerily, who saluted him, and said—"I have lost my sweetheart by the plague, but I shall soon get another." The next was a grave man, who muttered, "I have lost all," and walked pensively on. Then came others in different moods, but all concurred in thinking that the plague was at an end; and the grocer derived additional confirmation that this was the general opinion, from meeting numerous carts and vehicles bringing families back to their houses from the country.

After roaming about for several hours, and pausing on all he saw, he found himself before the great western entrance of St. Paul's. It chanced to be the morning on which the pallets and bedding were brought forth, and he watched the proceeding at a distance. All had been removed, and he was about to depart, when he perceived a person seated on a block of stone, and thinking he recognized him, walked towards him.

"Leonard," he cried, "Leonard Holt, is it you?"

Thus addressed, and in these familiar tones, the apprentice looked up, and Mr. Bloundel started at the change that had taken place in him. Profound grief was written in every line of his thin and haggard countenance; his eyes were hollow, and had the most melancholy expression imaginable; and his flesh was wasted away from the bone. He looked the very image of hopeless affliction.

"I am sorry to find you in this state, Leonard," said the grocer, in a tone of deep commiseration; "but I am well aware of the cause. I myself have suffered severely, but I deem it my duty to control my affliction."

"I would control it, if it were possible, Mr. Bloundel," replied Leonard. "But hope is dead in my breast. I shall never be happy again."

"I trust otherwise," replied the grocer, kindly. "Your trials have been very great, and so were those of the poor creature we both of us mourn. But she is at peace, and therefore we need not lament her."

"Alas!" exclaimed Leonard, mournfully, "I am now only anxious to rejoin her."

"It is selfish, if not sinful, to grieve in this way," said Mr. Bloundel, somewhat sternly. "You must bear your affliction like a man. Come home with me. I will be a father to you. Nay, do not hesitate. Come—come!"

So saying, he took Leonard's arm, and led him in the direction of Wood-street. Nothing passed between them on the way, nor did Leonard evince any further emotion until he entered the door of the grocer's dwelling, when he uttered a deep groan. Mrs. Bloundel was greatly affected at seeing him, as were the rest of the family, and abundance of tears were shed by all, except Mr. Bloundel, who maintained his customary stoical demeanour throughout the meeting.

Satisfied that the pestilence had not declined sufficiently to warrant him in opening his house, the grocer determined to await the result of a few weeks. Indeed, that very night, he began to think he had defeated his plans by precipitancy. He was sitting after prayers with his family when he was seized with a sudden shivering and sickness, which he could not doubt were the precursors of the plague, and was greatly alarmed, though he did not lose his command over himself.

"I have been most imprudent," he said, "in thus exposing myself to infection. I have symptoms of the plague about me. I will instantly retire to one of the upper rooms, which I have laid aside as a hospital, in case of an emergency like the present. None of you must attend me. Leonard will fetch Doctor Hodges and a nurse. I shall then do very well. Farewell, dear wife and children! God bless you all, and watch over you. Remember me in your prayers!"

So saying, he arose and walked towards the door. His wife and his elder son would have assisted him, but he motioned them away.

"Let me go with you, sir," said Leonard, who had arisen with the others. "I will nurse you. My life is of little consequence; and I cannot be more satisfactorily employed."

The grocer reluctantly assented, and the apprentice assisted him up stairs, and helped to place him in bed. No plague-token could be found about his person, but as the same alarming symptoms still continued, Leonard administered to him such remedies as he thought needful, and then went in search of Doctor Hodges.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

HOW THE GROCER OPENED HIS HOUSE.

ON reaching Watling-street, Leonard found Doctor Hodges about to retire to rest. The worthy physician was filled with consternation on hearing of Mr. Bloundel's illness, but was somewhat re-assured by the apprentice's description of his symptoms.

"From what you tell me, I do not think it can be the plague," he said; "however, we shall see, and no precaution must be neglected."

While preparing certain medicines, and arming himself with his surgical implements, he questioned Leonard as to the cause of his long disappearance.

"Having seen nothing of you," he said, "since that fatal night when our poor Amabel's sorrows were ended, I began to feel very apprehensive on your account. Where have you been?"

"You shall hear," replied Leonard, "though the relation will open my wounds afresh. On recovering from the shock I had received from beholding Amabel's body borne to the dead-cart, I found myself stretched upon a bed in a house whither I had been conveyed by Rainbird, the watchman, who had discovered me lying in a state of insensibility in the street. For nearly a week I was delirious, and should probably have died but for the attentions of the watchman. As soon as I was able to move, I wandered to the lesser plague-pit, in Finsbury-fields, where Amabel's remains had been interred, and for the first time wept. My heart seemed breaking, and I thought I should pour forth my very soul. Still my tears were a relief. Every evening for a month I went to the plague-pit, and remained there till day-break, when I returned to Rainbird's abode. At last he was seized by the distemper; but though I nursed him, voluntarily exposing myself to infection and praying to be removed, I remained untouched. He died; and having seen his body thrown into the pit, I set off into Berkshire, and after three days toilsome walking, for I was almost too weak to perform the journey on foot, reached Ashdown Park. It was a melancholy pleasure to behold the abode where she I had loved had passed her last few days of happiness, and where I had been near her. Her aunt, good Mrs. Buscot, who was overwhelmed by affliction at the sad tidings I brought her, received me with the utmost kindness, and tried to console me. But my sorrow was too deep to be cured. Wandering over the downs, I visited Mrs. Compton at Kingston Lisle, from whose house Amabel was carried off by the perfidious Earl. She, also, received me with the greatest kindness, and strove, like Mrs. Buscot, to comfort me, and, like her, ineffectually. Finding my strength declining, and persuading myself that my days were drawing to a close, I retraced my steps to London, hoping to find a final resting-place near her I had loved."

"You are, indeed, faithful to the grave, Leonard," said the physician, brushing away a tear; "and I never heard or read of affection stronger than yours. It perplexes me that it should not have been required. You and Amabel seemed formed for each other. However, your union was not intended, and it is in vain to speculate on what might have been. Affliction is a great purifier, and you will come out all the better for your trial. You are yet young, and though you never can love as you have loved a second time, your heart is not utterly seared."

"Utterly, sir," replied Leonard, "utterly."

"You think so now," rejoined the physician. "But you will find it otherwise hereafter. I can tell you of one person who has suffered almost as much from your disappearance as you have done for the loss of Amabel. The Lady Isabella Argentine has made constant inquiries after you; and though I should be the last person to try to rouse you from your present state of despondency, by awakening hopes in your breast of an alliance with the sister of a proud noble, yet it may afford you consolation to know that she still cherishes the warmest regard for you."

"I am grateful to her," replied Leonard, sadly. "She was dear to Amabel, and therefore will be ever dear to me. I would fain know," he added, his brow contracting, and his lip quivering, "what has become of the Earl of Rochester?"

"He has married a wealthy heiress, the fair Mistress Mallett," replied Hodges.

"Married so soon!" cried Leonard. "And he has quite forgotten his victim?"

"Apparently so," replied the doctor.

"And it was for one who so lightly regarded her that she sacrificed herself," groaned Leonard, his head dropping upon his breast.

"Come, come," cried Hodges, taking his arm, and leading him out of the room. "We must go and look after your master. He now entirely claims our attention."

"True, true," replied Leonard, hurrying out of the house. "Anything to stifle my feelings."

With this, they made the best of their way to Wood-street. On arriving at the grocer's house they went up stairs, and Hodges immediately pronounced that Mr. Bloundel was only suffering from a slight feverish attack, which a sudorific powder would remove. Having administered the remedy, he descended to the lower room to allay the fears of the family. Mrs. Bloundel received the tidings with tears of joy, and following the example of her husband, summoned all her children and household, and offered up prayers for his preservation. Doctor Hodges joined in their devotions; and when the family separated, remained a little time with Mrs. Bloundel to condole with her on the loss she had sustained. The good dame wept bitterly on hearing the particulars, with which she was hitherto unacquainted, of her daughter's death, but she soon regained her composure. They then spoke of Leonard, who had remained upstairs with his master,—of his blighted hopes, and seemingly incurable affliction.

"His is true love, indeed, doctor," sighed Mrs. Bloundel. "Pity it is that it could not be requited."

"So I told him," rejoined Hodges. "I know not how it is, and will not question the decrees of our All-Wise Ruler, but the strongest affection seldom, if ever, meets with a return. Leonard himself was insensible to the devotion of one, of whom I may say without disparaging our poor Amabel, that she was in my opinion her superior in personal attractions."

"And does this person love him still?" inquired Mrs. Bloundel. "I ask, because I regard him as a son, and earnestly desire to restore him to happiness."

"Alas!" exclaimed Hodges, "there are obstacles in the way that cannot be removed. We must endeavour to cure him of his grief in some other way."

The conversation then dropped, and Doctor Hodges took his leave, promising to return on the morrow, and assuring Mrs. Bloundel that he need be under no further apprehension about her husband.

And so it proved. The powders removed all the grocer's feverish symptoms, and when Doctor Hodges made his appearance the next day, he found him dressed, and ready to go down stairs. Having received the physician's congratulations on his entire recovery, Mr. Bloundel inquired from him when he thought he might with propriety open his shop. Hodges considered for a moment, and then replied, "I do not see any great risk in doing so now, but I would advise you to defer it a fortnight longer. I would, also, recommend you to take the whole of your family for a short time into the country. Pure air and change of scene are absolutely necessary after their long confinement."

"Farmer Wingfield, of Kensal-green, and who sheltered us on our way to Ashdown Park, will, I am sure, receive you," observed Leonard.

"If so, you cannot go to a better place," rejoined the physician.

"I will think of it," returned Bloundel. So saying, he went down stairs and embraced his wife and children, who welcomed him with the warmest demonstrations of delight.

"My apprehensions, you perceive, were groundless," he remarked to his wife.

"Heaven be praised they were so!" she rejoined. "But I entreat you not to stir forth again till all danger is at an end."

"Rest assured I will not," he answered.

Soon after this Doctor Hodges took his leave, and had nearly reached the street door, when he was arrested by Patience, who inquired with much anxiety whether he knew anything of Blaize?

"I am quite miserable about him," she said, "and trust he has not perished, as he expected to do, of the plague."

"Make yourself easy about him, child," replied Hodges, "I am pretty sure he is safe and sound. He has had the plague, but he left the hospital at Saint Paul's perfectly cured."

"Oh, then I shall see him again," cried Patience, joyfully. "Poor dear little fellow, it would break my heart to lose him."

"I will make inquiries after him," rejoined Hodges, "and, if I can find him, will send him home."

And without waiting to receive the kitchen-maid's thanks, he departed.

For some days, the grocer continued to pursue pretty nearly the same line of conduct that he had adopted during the height of the pestilence. But he did not neglect to make preparations for resuming his business, and here Leonard was of material assistance to him. They often spoke of Amabel, and Mr. Bloundel strove, by the strongest arguments he was master of, to remove the weight of affliction under which his apprentice laboured. He so far succeeded that Leonard's health improved, though he still seemed a prey to secret sorrow. Things were in this state when one day a knock was heard at the street-door, and the summons being answered by the grocer's eldest son, Stephen, he returned with the intelligence that a person was without who desired to see Patience. After some consideration, Mr. Bloundel summoned the kitchen-maid, and told her she might admit the stranger into the passage, and hear what he had to say. Patience hastened with a beating heart to the door, expecting to learn something of Blaize, and opening it, admitted a man wrapped in a large cloak, and having a broad-leaved hat pulled over his brows. On entering the passage, he threw aside the cloak and raised the hat, discovering the figure and features of Pillichody.

"What brings you here, sir?" demanded Patience in alarm, and glancing over her shoulder to see whether any one was near. "What do you want?"

"I have brought you news of Blaize," returned the bully. "But how charmingly you look. By the coral lips of Venus! your long confinement has added to your beauty."

"Never mind my beauty, sir," rejoined Patience, impatiently. "Where is Blaize? Why did he not come with you?"

"Alas!" replied Pillichody, in a melancholy tone, "he could not."

"Could not!" half screamed Patience. "You don't mean to say he is dead?"

"Do not question me," replied Pillichody, feigning to brush away a tear. "He was my friend, and I would rather not speak of him. The sight of your loveliness transports me so, that by the treasures of Croesus! I would rather have you without a crown than the wealthiest widow in the country. It is well Blaize is out of the way."

"Don't talk nonsense to me in this way," sobbed Patience. "I'm not in the humour for it."

"Nonsense," echoed Pillichody. "I swear to you I am in earnest. By Cupid! I am ravished with your charms." And he would have seized her hand, but Patience hastily withdrew it; and, provoked at his conduct, dealt him a sound box on the ears. As she did this, she thought she heard a suppressed laugh near her, and looked round, but could see no one. The sound certainly did not proceed from Pillichody, for he looked very red and very angry.

"Do not repeat this affront, mistress," he said to her. "I can bear anything but a blow from your sex."

"Then tell me what has become of Blaize?" she cried.

"You do not deserve that I should spare your feelings," he rejoined. "He is no more."

"No more!" echoed Patience, with a scream. "Oh, dear me—I shall never survive it,—I shall die."

"No; you must live for me," cried Pillichody, catching her in his arms; "I will supply his place."

"You!" cried Patience, contemptuously, "I would not have you for the world. Where is he buried?"

"In the plague-pit," replied Pillichody. "I attended him during his illness. It was his second attack. He spoke of you."

"Did he?—dear little fellow," she cried. "Oh, tell me what he said?"

"Tell her," he cried, rejoined Pillichody, "that my last thoughts were of her."

"Oh dear! oh, dear!" cried Patience, hysterically.

"Tell her also," he added, pursued Pillichody, "that I trust she will fulfil my last injunction."

"What is it,—oh! what is it?" asked Patience.

"He conjured you to marry me," replied Pillichody. "I am sure you will not hesitate to comply with the request."

"I don't believe a word of this," cried Patience. "Blaize was a great deal too jealous to bequeath me to another."

"Right, sweetheart, right," cried Blaize, pushing open the door. "This has all been done to try your fidelity. I am now fully satisfied of your attachment; and having quite recovered from the plague, am ready to marry you whenever you please."

"So this was all a trick," cried Patience, pettishly. "I wish I had known it, I would have retaliated upon you nicely. You ought to be ashamed of yourself, Major Pillichody, for lending a helping hand in such a matter."

"I did it to oblige my friend Blaize," replied Pillichody. "It was agreed between us that if you showed any inconstancy, you were to be mine."

"Indeed!" exclaimed Patience. "I would not advise you to repeat the experiment, Mr. Blaize."

"I never intend to do so, my angel," replied the porter. "I esteem myself the happiest and most fortunate of men."

"You have great reason to do so," observed Pillichody. "I do not despair of supplanting him yet," he muttered to himself. "And now farewell!" he added aloud, "I am only in the way, and, besides, I have no particular desire to encounter Mr. Bloundel or his apprentice." So saying, he kissed his hand to Patience, and took his departure.

It was well that he went when he did, for Blaize had scarcely bestowed more than one embrace on the pretty kitchen-maid, when they were interrupted by the entrance of Mr. Bloundel. The grocer was greatly delighted to see the porter, and gave him a hearty welcome.

"Ah, sir, I have had a narrow escape," cried Blaize, "and never expected to see you, or my mother, or Patience again. I have had the plague, sir, and never wish to have a second attack."

"I heard from Leonard Holt and Doctor Hodges of your seizure," replied Mr. Bloundel. "But where have you been since you left Saint Paul's?"

"In the country," rejoined Blaize; "sometimes at one farm-house, and sometimes at another. I only returned to London yesterday, and met an old friend, whom I begged to go before me, and see that all was well here before I ventured in."

"We have all been providentially spared," said Mr. Bloundel, "and you will find your mother as well as when you last quitted her."

"I was deeply grieved to hear of the calamity you have suffered in the death of your daughter, sir," remarked Blaize, in a tone of unaffected emotion.

"Go to your mother," said Mr. Bloundel, motioning him off.

Blaize gladly obeyed, and was received by old Josyna with a scream of delight. She embraced him, sobbed over him, and ran for a bottle of sack, which she poured down his throat so hastily as nearly to choke him. She then spread abundance of eatables before him, and Blaize did ample justice to the repast. After he had eaten and drank his full, his mother offered him as a treat a little of the plague medicine, which she had in reserve.

"No, thank you, mother," replied Blaize. "I have had enough of that. But if there should be a box of refuses amongst the store you can bring it, as I think half a dozen would do me good."

Three days after Blaize's return, Leonard was sent forth to ascertain the precise state of the city, as, if all proved favourable, the grocer proposed opening his house on the following day. Leonard set out betimes, and was convinced that all apprehension of danger was at an end. A severe frost had set in, and had completely purified the air. And how different was the general aspect from what it had been a few months ago. The houses were again inhabited, the shops opened, and business carried on as usual. For the last few days there had been no deaths that Leonard could ascertain, of the plague, and but little mortality of any kind. He traversed all the main streets, and many of the narrower thoroughfares, and found the same evidences of restored health and confidence every where. It is true there were many traces of the scourge in some districts where houses in which whole families had been swept off were still left untenanted. But the one pervading impression was that all was over. Before returning to Wood-street, an irresistible impulse led him to Finsbury-fields. He passed through the postern east of Cripplegate, and shaped his way towards the lesser plague-pit. The sun, which had been bright all the morning, was now partially obscured; the air thickened, and a little snow fell. The ground was blackened and bound by the hard frost, and the grass felt hard and crisp beneath his feet. Insensible to all external circumstances, he hurried forward, taking the most direct course, and leaping every impediment in his path. In this way he crossed several fields, and at length stood before a swollen heap of clay, round which a wooden railing was placed. Springing over the enclosure, and uttering a wild cry that showed the uncontrollable anguish of his breast, he flung himself upon the mound. He remained there in a state of the deepest affliction for some time, when he was roused by a hand laid upon his shoulder, and raising himself, beheld Thirlby.

"I thought it must be you," said the new-comer, in accents of the deepest commiseration. "I have been visiting yonder plague-pit for the same melancholy purpose as yourself,—to mourn over my lost child, but dare not remain here longer, though I have much to say to you. Will you meet me in this place at midnight to-morrow?"

Leonard signified his assent.

"I am in danger," pursued Thirlby, "for by some means the secret of my existence has been made known, and the officers of justice are in pursuit of me. I suspect that Judith Malmayns is my betrayer. But you will not fail me. I have much to say to you."

"I will not," returned Leonard.

Upon this Thirlby hurried away, and leaping a hedge, disappeared from view.

Leonard slowly and sorrowfully returned to Wood-street. On his arrival there he assured his master that he might with entire safety open his house, as he proposed, on the morrow; and Doctor Hodges, who visited the grocer the same evening, confirmed the opinion. Early, therefore, on the following morning, Mr. Bloundel summoned his family to prayers; and, after returning thanks with peculiar fervour and solemnity, he went, accompanied by them all, and threw open the street door. Here he again knelt down at the threshold, and prayed fervently as before. He then proceeded to unfasten each window and shutter, until all were opened. The transition from gloom and darkness to bright daylight was almost overpowering. For the first time for six months the imprisoned family looked forth on the external world, and were dazzled and bewildered by all they beheld. The grocer himself, despite his sober judgment, could scarcely believe he had not been in a trance during the whole period. The shop was scarcely opened before it was filled with customers, and Leonard and Stephen were instantly employed. But the grocer would sell nothing. To those who asked for any article he possessed, he presented them with it, but would receive no payment.

He next despatched Blaize to bring together all the poor he could find; and distributed among them the remainder of his store,—his casks of flour, his salted meat, his cheeses, his biscuits, his wine,—in short, all that was left.

"This I give," he said, "as a thanksgiving to the Lord, and as a testimony of gratitude for my signal deliverance."

CHAPTER XLIX.

THE MIDNIGHT MEETING.

THE firstday of his deliverance being spent by the grocer in the praiseworthy manner above related, he laid his head upon his pillow with a feeling of satisfaction such as he had not for months experienced. Not that he was entirely happy, for the thought of the heavy loss he had sustained in the death of his daughter, whose image throughout the day had been constantly before him, weighed upon his heart, and threw a cloud over his felicity. Still his emotions, though sad, were not painful. The work he had undertaken was achieved, and the rest of his family were saved. A very remarkable dream occurred to him that night, and its recollection afterwards afforded him the greatest consolation. While thinking of Amabel, and of the delight her presence would have afforded him, slumber stole upon him, and his dreams were naturally influenced by his previous meditations. It appeared to him that he was alone within his house, and while visiting one of the upper rooms which had formerly been appropriated to Amabel, he noticed a small door in the wall, that had never before attracted his attention. He immediately pushed against it, and, yielding to the touch, it admitted him to an apartment with which he seemed acquainted, though he could not recal the time when he had seen it. It was large and gloomy, panelled with dark and lustrous oak, and filled with rich but decayed furniture. At the further end stood a large antique bed, hung round with tarnished brocade curtains. The grocer shuddered at the sight, for he remembered to have heard Doctor Hodges assert, that in such a bed, and in such a room as this his daughter had breathed her last. Some one appeared to be within the bed, and rushing forward with a throbbing heart, and a conviction of what was to follow, he beheld the form of Amabel. Yes, there she was, with features like those she wore on earth, but clothed with such celestial beauty, and bearing the impress of such serene happiness, that the grocer felt awe-struck as he gazed at her.

"Approach, my father," she said, in a voice so musical, that it thrilled through his frame—"approach, and let what you now hear be for ever graven upon your breast. Do not lament for me more, but rather rejoice that I am removed from trouble, and in the enjoyment of supreme felicity. Such a state you will yourself attain. You have run the good race, and will assuredly reap your reward. Comfort my dear mother, my brothers, my sister, with the assurance of what I now tell you, and bid them dry their tears. I can now read the secrets of all hearts, and know how true was Leonard Holt's love for me, and how deep and sincere is his present sorrow. But I am not permitted to appear to him, as I now appear to you. Often have I heard him invoke me in accents of the wildest despair, and have floated past him on the midnight breeze, but could neither impart consolation to him, nor make him sensible of my presence, because his grief was sinful. But bid him be comforted. Bid him put a due control upon his feelings. Bid him open his heart anew, and he shall yet be happy, yet love again, and have his love requited. Farewell, dear father!"

And with these words, the curtains of the bed closed over the visionary form. The grocer stretched out his arm to draw them aside, and in the effort awakened. He slept no more that night, but dwelt with unutterable delight on the beatific vision he had beheld. On rising, his first object was to seek out Leonard, and to relate his dream to him. The apprentice listened in speechless wonder, and remained for some time lost in reflection.

"From any other person than yourself, sir," he said, at length, "I should have doubted this singular story, but coming from you, I attach implicit credence to it. I will obey your sainted daughter's injunctions. I will struggle against the grief that overwhelms me, and I will try to hope that her words may be fulfilled, and that sure happiness is in store for me."

"You will do wisely," rejoined Mr. Bloundel. "As soon as we have breakfasted, we will walk together to the farm-house you spoke of at Kensal-green, and if its owner should prove willing to receive my family for a few weeks, I will remove them thither at once."

Leonard applauded his master's resolution, expressing his firm conviction that Farmer Wingfield would readily accede to the proposal, and the rest of the family having by this time assembled, they sat down to breakfast. As soon as the meal was over, Mr. Bloundel entrusted the care of the shop to his son Stephen and Blaize, and accompanied by Leonard, set forth. On the way to the west end of the town, the grocer met one or two of his old friends, and they welcomed each other like men risen from the grave. Their course took them through Saint Giles's, where the plague had raged with the greatest severity, and where many houses were still without tenants.

"If all had done as I have done," sighed the grocer, as he gazed at those desolate habitations, "how many lives, under God's providence, would have been saved!"

"In my own opinion, sir," replied Leonard, "you owe your preservation as much to your piety as your prudence."

"I have placed my trust on high," rejoined the grocer, "and I have not been forsaken. And yet many evil-doers have escaped. Amongst others—"

"I know whom you mean, sir," interrupted Leonard, with some fierceness, "but a day of retribution will arrive for him."

"No more of this," rejoined the grocer, severely, "remember the solemn injunction you have received."

At this moment they observed a horseman, richly attired, and followed by a couple of attendants, riding rapidly towards them. Both instantly recognized him. The apprentice's cheek and brow flushed with anger, and Mr. Bloundel had much ado to control his emotion. It was the Earl of Rochester, and on seeing them he instantly dismounted, and flinging the bridle of his steed to one of the attendants, advanced towards them. Noticing the fury that gleamed in Leonard's eyes, and apprehending some violence on his part, the grocer laid his hand upon his arm, and sternly enjoined him to collect himself.

By this time the Earl of Rochester had reached them. "Mr. Bloundel," said the Earl, in a tone of much emotion, and with a look that seemed to bespeak contrition, "I heard that you had opened your house yesterday, and was about to call upon you. I have a few words to say to you on a subject painful to both of us, but doubly painful to me,—your daughter."

"I must decline to hear them, my lord," replied the grocer, coldly, "nor shall you ever cross my threshold again if I can prevent it. My poor child is now at peace. You can do her no further injury, and must settle your own account with your Maker."

"Do not refuse me your forgiveness," said the Earl. "I will make every reparation in my power."

"You can make none," replied the grocer, frowning; "and as to my forgiveness, I neither refuse it, nor accord it. I pray your lordship to let me pass. The sole favour I ask you is to come near me no more."

"I obey you," replied the Earl. "Stay," he added to Leonard, who stood by, regarding him with a look of deadly animosity, "I would give you a piece of caution. Your life is in danger."

"I can easily guess from whom," replied the apprentice, scornfully.

"You mistake," rejoined Rochester; "you have nothing to apprehend from me. You have promised to meet some one to-night," he added, in so low a tone as to be inaudible to the grocer. "Do not go."

"Your lordship's warning will not deter me," rejoined the apprentice.

"As you will," rejoined Rochester, turning away. "Your blood be upon your own head."

With this, he sprang upon his horse, and striking his spurs into his side, dashed off, while Leonard and the grocer took the opposite direction. In less than half an hour, they reached the little village of Paddington, then consisting of a few houses, but now one of the most populous and important parishes of the metropolis, and speedily gained the open country. Even at this dreary season, the country had charms, which Mr. Bloundel, after his long confinement, did not fail to appreciate. His eye roamed over the wide prospect, and the leafless trees, the bare hedges, and the frost-bound fields, seemed pleasant in his sight. He quickened his pace, and being wholly indifferent to the cold, greatly enjoyed the exercise. Leonard pointed out to him the spots where the fugitives from the plague had pitched their tents, and also the pest-house near Westbourne-green, where he himself had been received during his second attack of the distemper, and which was now wholly unoccupied. The sight elicited a groan from Mr. Bloundel.

Soon after this, they mounted the hill beyond Kensal-green, and approached the farm-house. Leonard descried Wingfield near one of the barns, and hailing him, he immediately came forward, and gave them a hearty welcome. On being informed of Mr. Bloundel's desire, he at once assented, and taking them into the house, mentioned the matter to his dame, who was quite of the same opinion as himself.

"The only difference between us," he said to Mr. Bloundel—"is as to the payment you propose. Now I will take none—not a farthing. Come when you please, bring whom you please, and stay as long as you please. But don't offer me anything, if you would not offend me. Recollect," he added, the moisture forcing itself into his eyes, "that I loved your daughter for her resemblance to my poor child. She too is gone I do this for her sake."

Mr. Bloundel shook the worthy man warmly by the hand, but he made no further objection, resolved in his own mind to find some other means of making him an adequate return for his hospitality. It was then agreed that the grocer should bring his family on the following day, and remain there for a month, and every other arrangement being made, and a hearty meal partaken of, he cordially thanked his host, and returned with Leonard to Wood-street.

In spite of his efforts to resist the impression produced by the Earl's warning, Leonard could not banish it from his mind; and though he did not for a moment think of abandoning his purpose, he resolved to attend the meeting armed. He told Mr. Bloundel he should go out that night, but without stating his object, and the grocer did not inquire it. Blaize sat up with him, and displayed much anxiety to know whither he was going, but, as may be supposed, his curiosity was not gratified. As the clock struck eleven, Leonard thrust a sword into his girdle, and arming himself further—more with his staff, proceeded towards the door, and bade Blaize to lock it after him.

"I shall probably be back in a couple of hours," he said, as he went forth. "You must sit up for me."

"I wonder where he is going," thought Blaize. "From his gloomy looks, and the weapon he has taken with him, I should judge he is about to commit some desperate deed. It must be prevented."

With this view, and perhaps rather more influenced by curiosity than charity, the porter waited a few seconds to allow the apprentice to get out of sight, and then locking the door outside, put the key in his pocket, and followed. The night was profoundly dark, but he had noticed which direction Leonard took, and running noiselessly along the street, he soon perceived him a little in advance. Taking care not to lose sight of the apprentice, and yet not to expose himself, he tracked his course along several streets, until he saw him pass through the second postern in the City wall, near Moorgate.

Here he debated with himself, whether he should proceed any further or turn back, but at length his curiosity got the better of his fears, and he went on. A few steps brought him into the open fields, and fancying he saw Leonard at a little distance before him, he hurried on in that direction. But he soon found he had been deceived by the stump of a tree, and began to fear he must have taken the wrong course. He looked around in vain for some object to guide him. The darkness was so profound that he could see nothing, and he set off again at random, and not without much self-reproach and misgiving.

At last, he reached a hedge, and was skirting it, when he perceived through the bushes the light of a lantern in the adjoining field. He immediately sprang upon the hedge, and called out, but at the cry the light instantly disappeared. This did not, however, prevent Blaize from making towards the spot where he had seen it vanish; but he had not proceeded far when his course was suddenly checked. He was forcibly seized by a person against whom he ran, thrown on the ground, and a drawn sword, for he felt the point, placed at his throat.

"Utter a cry, and it is your last," cried a stern voice. "Where is he?"

"Who—who?" demanded Blaize, half dead with terror.

"He whom you appointed to meet," replied the unknown.

"I appointed to meet no one," rejoined Blaize.

"Liar!" exclaimed the other—"if you do not instantly lead me to him, I will cut your throat."

"I will lead you wherever you please, if you will let me get up," rejoined Blaize, with difficulty repressing a cry.

"By Pluto!" exclaimed a voice which sounded like music in the porter's ears, "I think you are mistaken in your man, my lord. It does not sound like the apprentice's voice."

"It is not the apprentice, good Major Pillichody," rejoined the porter. "It is I, your friend—Blaize."

"Blaize!" exclaimed Pillichody, unmasking a dark lantern, and revealing the terror-stricken countenance of the porter—"So it is. Why what are you doing here?"

"The devil himself, who put it into my head to come, only knows," replied Blaize, "but I followed Leonard Holt."

"Which way did he take?" asked the person who had assailed him.

"I cannot exactly say, my lord," replied Blaize—"but he seemed to go straight into the fields."

"He is no doubt gone to the plague-pit," replied the other. "You are now at liberty," he added to Blaize, "and I counsel you to make the best of your way home. Say nothing to your master of what has occurred. The city walls lie in that direction."

Overjoyed to be released, Blaize ran off as fast as his legs could carry him, and never stopped till he reached Moorgate.

Meanwhile, Leonard had reached the place of meeting. As he stood by the rail surrounding the plague-pit, he thought of Mr. Bloundel's singular dream, and almost hoping to be similarly favoured, flung himself on his knees, and besought Amabel, if it were possible, to appear to him. But his entreaties produced no result. The chill blast whistled past him, and mindful of what his master had told him, he was fain to interpret this into an answer to his request. The night was bitterly cold, and Leonard, whose limbs were almost stiffened by long kneeling, walked round and round the enclosure at a quick pace to get his blood into circulation. As the hour of midnight was tolled forth by the neighbouring churches, he heard footsteps, and could just detect a figure advancing towards him.

"Are you there?" was asked in the voice of Thirlby.

Leonard replied in the affirmative, and the other instantly joined him.

"Have you mentioned this meeting to any one?" inquired Leonard. "I ask because I was warned by the Earl of Rochester not to attend it."

"Strange!" exclaimed Thirlby. "I mentioned it to one person, certainly—but one who I am certain would keep it secret. However, do not let us waste time. I am about to leave London,—perhaps this country,—for ever. But I could not depart without an interview with you. You are aware of my strong attachment to my poor lost child. My daughter Isabella now supplies her place in my heart. She is the only being I love on earth, for my son has alienated himself from my affections. All I desire is to see her happy. This I find can only be accomplished in one way."

Here he paused for a moment, but as Leonard made no remark, he proceeded.

"Why should I hesitate to declare it," he said, "since it was for that object I brought you hither. She loves you—devotedly loves you, and if her wishes were opposed I should tremble for the consequences. Now listen to me, young man. Situated as you now are, you never can wed her. I will, however, point out a means by which you can raise yourself to distinction in a short time, and so entitle yourself to claim her hand. I will supply you with money—more than you can require—place you at court—near the King's person—and if you act under my direction your rise is certain. I have extorted a promise to this effect from my son. I told him my object, and that if he did not make your fortune I could ruin his by revealing myself. I may, perhaps, pay the penalty of my crime on the scaffold; but I may also escape. In either case it would be fatal to him. He has consented to co-operate with me—to watch over your fortunes—and as soon as you have attained sufficient eminence to bestow his sister upon you. Now, do you understand?"

"I do," replied Leonard; "and I understand also against whom the Earl of Rochester warned me."

"And you consent?" demanded Thirlby.

Leonard was about to answer, when he felt a light and trembling hand placed upon his own.

"Do not answer inconsiderately, Leonard," said a low, sweet voice, which he recognised as that of the Lady Isabella, "I am here to receive your determination."

"I am glad of it," replied the apprentice. "The deep devotion you have displayed towards me deserves to be requited, and shall be requited. I will strive to render myself worthy of you, and I feel that by so doing I shall best fulfil the injunctions of her who lies beside us. Henceforth, Lady Isabella, I wholly devote myself to you."

A murmur of delight escaped her.

"My blessings on you both!" exclaimed her father. "Give me your hand, Isabella," he added, taking it and placing it in that of the apprentice. "Here, beside the grave of her whom you both loved, I affiancé you. Pursue the course I point out to you, Leonard, and she will soon be yours."

As he spoke, the light of a lantern was suddenly thrown upon them, disclosing two persons who had noiselessly approached. They were Lord Argentine and Pillichody.

"You affirm more than you have warrant for, my lord," said the former. "I never will consent to this ill-assorted and dishonourable union; and so far from permitting it, will oppose it to the utmost of my power. If this apprentice dares to raise his ambitious views towards my sister, let him look to his own safety. Your safety lies in instant flight. The officers are in search of you."

"They shall find me," replied Thirlby, sternly.

"As you please, my lord," rejoined Argentine.

"Come with me, madam," he added, to his sister.

But she flew with a cry towards Leonard.

"Ah!" exclaimed her brother, drawing his sword.

"Do you dare to detain her? Deliver her to me, villain, instantly."

"Not when thus menaced, my lord," rejoined Leonard, likewise drawing his sword, and standing upon the defensive.

"Then look to yourself," replied Argentine, assailing him.

Isabella uttered a wild shriek, and Thirlby tried to rush between them. But before they could be separated, Lord Argentine's fury had exposed him to his adversary, whose sword passed through his body. He fell to the ground, weltering in blood.

While Leonard stood stupified and confounded at what had occurred; and Isabella, uttering a loud cry, threw herself upon the body, and tried to staunch the wound; two men, with halberts in their hands, rushed forward, and, seizing Thirlby, said, "We arrest you, as a murderer."

Thirlby, who seemed utterly overcome by surprise and horror, offered no resistance.

At this juncture, Leonard felt his arm seized by a bystander,—he did not know whom,—and scarcely conscious of what was taking place, suffered himself to be dragged from the scene.

BOOK THE SIXTH.

CHAPTER L.

THE FIRE-BALL.

ABOUT nine o'clock on the night of Saturday, the 2nd of September, 1666,—and a memorable night it proved in the history of this metropolis,—three men took their way from Smithfield to Islington. They proceeded at a swift pace and in silence, until, having mounted the steep hill on which the suburb in question is situated, and which was then little more than a small sequestered village, they halted at a short distance from the high walls surrounding the great waterworks formed by the New River. It was a fine night, and, though dark, clear and cloudless,—occasioned, probably, by the strong easterly wind that prevailed at the time.

"It is dark in London now," observed one of three persons to his companions, as he cast his eye towards the great city, that lay buried in gloom beneath them, "but there will be light enough soon."

"A second dawn, and brighter than the first, shall arise upon it," replied one of his companions, a tall gaunt man, whose sole covering seemed to be a sheep-skin, girded round his loins. "Such a flame shall be kindled within it, as hath not been seen since showers of fire were rained upon the rebellious cities of the plain. 'The Lord shall come with flames of fire,' " he added, pointing his long staff upwards, and then stretching it towards the city. "'He shall make them like a fiery oven, in the time of his wrath. The fire shall consume them.' "

"Amen!" exclaimed the third person, who stood near him, in a deep voice, and with something of a foreign accent.

"Not so loud, friends," rejoined the first speaker. "Let us set about the task. I will ascertain that no one is on the watch."

With this, he moved towards the waterworks, and having skirted its circular walls, and satisfied himself all was secure, he returned to his companions, and they proceeded to the large wooden gates that formed the principal entrance to the place. Producing a key, the leader of the party noiselessly unlocked the gates, and admitted the others into an open space of some extent, in the midst of which stood a large reservoir of water.

He then gave each of them a small key, and bidding them use despatch, they began to turn the cocks of the leaden pipes connected with the reservoir, while he hastened to the further end of the inclosure, and employed himself in a similar manner. In this way, and in less than a quarter of an hour, the whole of the cocks were stopped.

"And now give me the keys," said the leader.

"Here is mine," replied Solomon Eagle.

"And mine," added the other.

Taking them as they were offered, the leader added his own to the number, and flung them as far as he could into the reservoir. A slight laugh burst from him as he listened to the splash occasioned by their fall into the water.

"They will not be found till this pool is drained," he observed to his companions. "And now let us go. Our business here is done."

"Stay yet a moment," cried Solomon Eagle, who was standing at the brink of the reservoir, with his eyes fixed upon it. "Stay!" he cried, arresting him. "A vision rises before me. I see in this watery mirror a representation of the flaming city. And what are those fearful forms that feed the fire? Fiends, in our likeness.—fiends! And see how wide and far the conflagration spreads. The whole city is swallowed up as by an earthquake. It sinks to the bottomless pit—down down!"

"No more of this," cried the leader impatiently. "Come along."

So saying, he proceeded to the gates, and locking them after him, flung the key away.

"A hundred pounds was paid to the servant of the chief officer of the works to bring those keys to me," he said, "and it was but a light reward for the service. They shall seek for water to quench the flames, but in vain."

"I like not the vision I have just beheld," said Solomon Eagle, in a troubled tone. "It seems to me as if it would end in our perdition."

"Think of it no more," rejoined the leader, "or regard it as it is,—a phantom created by your overheated imagination. Yon city has sinned so deeply, that it is the will of Heaven it should be burned to the ground; and it has been put into our hearts by the Supreme Power to undertake the terrible task. We are the chosen instruments of the Divine displeasure. Every thing favours the design,—the long-continued dry weather,—the strong easterly wind, which will bear the flames into the heart of the city,—the want of water, occasioned by the stopping of these pipes, and the destruction of the great engine at London-bridge, which we have accomplished. Every thing favours it, I say, and proves that the hand of Heaven is in it. Yes, London shall fall. It shall be utterly consumed by fire. We have received our terrible commission from on high, and must execute it, regardless of the consequences. For my own part, I feel as little compunction as the thunder-bolt launched from on high does for the tree it shivers.”

“Philip Grant has spoken my sentiments exactly,” said the man who it has been mentioned had a slight foreign accent. “I have neither misgiving nor compunction. You appear to have forgotten your own denunciations, brother.”

“Not so, Robert Hubert,” rejoined the enthusiast, “and I now recognize in the vision a delusion of the Evil One to turn me from my holy purpose. But it has failed. The impious and impenitent city is doomed, and nothing can save it. And yet I would fain behold it once more, as I beheld it this morn when day arose upon it for the last time, from the summit of Saint Paul’s. It looked so beautiful that my heart smote me, and tears started to my eyes, to think those goodly habitations, those towers, those temples, those halls, those palaces, would so soon be a heap of blackened ruins.”

“Hear what the prophet saith,” rejoined Hubert. “Thou hast defiled thy sanctuaries by the multitude of thine iniquities, by the iniquity of thy traffic, therefore, will I bring forth a fire from the midst of thee, and will bring thee to ashes upon the earth, in the sight of all them that behold thee.”

“True,” replied Solomon Eagle, “and before we proceed further, let us pray for directions as to the course we ought to pursue.”

And as he spoke he flung himself on his knees, and his example was imitated by the others. Having recited a prayer in a low deep tone, he arose, and stretching out his arms, solemnly denounced the city. As he pronounced the words, a red and fiery star shot from the dark vault of the sky, and seemed to drop in the midst of the city.

“Did you not see that sign?” cried Grant, eagerly. “It heralds us to our task.”

With this, he ran swiftly down the hill, and, followed by the others, did not slacken his pace till they entered the city. They then shaped their course more slowly towards Saint Paul’s. Having gained the precincts of the cathedral, Solomon Eagle, who now assumed the place of leader, conducted them to a small door on the left of the great northern entrance, and unlocking it, ushered them into a narrow passage behind the rich carved work of the choir. Traversing it, they crossed the mid aisle, and soon reached the steps leading to Saint Faith’s. It was profoundly dark, but they were all well acquainted with the road, and did not miss their footing. It required, however, some caution to thread the ranks of mighty pillars within the subterranean church; but at last this was accomplished, and they entered the vault beyond the chancel, where they found Chowles and Judith Malmayns. The former was wrapped in a long black cloak, and was pacing to and fro within the chamber in a very impatient manner. When Solomon Eagle appeared, he sprang towards him, and regarding him inquiringly, cried, “Have you done it?—have you done it?”

The enthusiast replied in the affirmative.

“Heaven be praised!” exclaimed Chowles. And he skipped about with the wildest expressions of delight. A gleam of satisfaction, too, darted forth from Judith’s savage eyes. She had neither risen nor altered her position on the arrival of the party, but she now got up, and questioned the enthusiast. A small iron lamp, suspended by a chain from the vaulted roof, lighted the chamber, and its rays fell upon a singular group. The most noticeable figure amidst it was that of Solomon Eagle, who, with his blazing eyes, his long jet black locks, his giant frame and tawny skin, looked like a superhuman being. Near him stood the person designated as Robert Hubert. He was a young man, and appeared to have lived a life of great austerity. His features were thin; his large black eyes set in deep caverns; and his limbs seemed almost destitute of flesh. He had the wild and uncertain look of insanity. His garb, which was tattered and threadbare, was that of a French ecclesiastic. The third person, who went by the name of Philip Grant, had a powerful frame, though somewhat bent, and a haughty deportment and look, greatly at variance with his miserable attire and haggard looks. He wore a long grizzled beard, and his features, though sharpened by care, retained some traces of a noble expression.

A few minutes having passed in conversation, Grant observed to the enthusiast, “I must now leave you for a short time. We shall not start till midnight. Give me the key that I may let myself out.”

“You are not going to betray us,” cried Chowles, suspiciously.

“Why should I betray you?” rejoined Grant, sternly. “I am too anxious for the event to disclose it, and who would believe me if I did?”

“True, true,” replied Chowles.

“I do not mistrust you,” said Solomon Eagle, delivering him the key.

“I know whither you are going,” observed Judith

Malmayns. "You are about to warn Mr. Bloundel and his partner,—apprentice no longer,—Leonard Holt, of the approaching conflagration. But your care will be in vain."

"Does she speak the truth, brother?" demanded Hubert, raising his eye from the Bible which he was reading in the corner.

"I will do nothing to endanger the design," rejoined Grant. "Of that rest assured."

With this, he strode forth, traversed Saint Faith's, and, notwithstanding the gloom, reached without difficulty the little door by which he had entered the cathedral. Issuing from it, he took the way, as Judith had surmised, to Wood-street, and pausing before the grocer's door, knocked against it.

The summons was presently answered by Blaize; and to Grant's inquiries whether his master was within, he replied, "Which of my masters do you mean? I have two."

"The younger," replied Grant,—"Leonard Holt."

"So far you are fortunate," rejoined Blaize. "Mr. Bloundel has retired to rest, but Mr. Holt is still down stairs. Pray what may be your business with him at this hour? It should be important."

"It is important," rejoined Grant, "and does not admit of a moment's delay. Tell him so."

Eyeing the stranger with a look of suspicion, the porter was about to enter into a parley with him, when Leonard himself cut it short, and learning the nature of the application, desired Grant to follow him into the adjoining room. The nine months which had passed over Leonard's head since we last beheld him, had wrought a material change in his appearance. He had a grave and thoughtful air, somewhat inclining to melancholy, but in other respects he was greatly improved. His health was completely restored, and the thoughtful expression added character to his handsome physiognomy, and harmonized well with his manly and determined bearing. He was habited plainly, but with some degree of taste. As Judith Malmayns had intimated, he was now Mr. Bloundel's partner, and his whole appearance denoted his improved circumstances. The alteration did not escape the notice of the stranger, who regarded him with much curiosity, and closed the door behind him as he entered the room.

"You are looking much better than when we last met, Leonard Holt," he said, in tones that made the hearer start, "and I am glad to hear it. Prosperity seems to attend your path, and you deserve it, while misery and every other ill—and I deserve them—dog mine."

"I did not recognise you at first, Mr. Thirloy," replied Leonard—"for, in truth, you are much changed. But you desired to speak with me on a matter of importance. Can I aid you? You may need money. Here is my purse."

"I do not want it," replied the other, scornfully rejecting the offer. "I have a proposal to make to you."

"I shall be glad to hear it," replied Leonard. "But first tell me how you effected your escape after your arrest on that disastrous night when, in self-defence, and unintentionally, I wounded your son, Lord Argentine."

"Would you had killed him!" cried the other, fiercely. "I have lost all feelings of a father for him. He it was who contrived my arrest, and he would have gladly seen me borne to the scaffold, certain that it would have freed him from me for ever. I was hurried away by the officers from the scene of strife, and conveyed to the Tun at Cornhill, which you know has been converted into a roundhouse. Here I was locked up for the night. But while I was lying on the floor of my prison, driven well nigh frantic by what had occurred, there were two persons without labouring to effect my deliverance, and they did not labour in vain. These were Chowles and Judith, my foster-sister, and whom, you may remember, I suspected,—and most unfairly, as it proved,—of intending my betrayal. By means of a heavy bribe, they prevailed on one of the officers who had charge of me to connive at my escape. A bar was removed from the window of my prison, and I got through the aperture. Judith concealed me for some days in the vaults of Saint Faith's, after which I fled into the country, where I wandered about from place to place, under the name of Philip Grant, for several months. Having learnt that my son, though severely hurt by you, had recovered from his wound; and that his sister, the Lady Isabella, had accompanied him to his seat in Staffordshire, I proceeded thither, and saw her, unknown to him. I found that her heart was still true to you. She told me you had disappeared immediately after the termination of the conflict, and had not been heard of till her brother was out of danger, when you returned to Wood-street."

"I was dragged away by a person whom I did not recognise at the time," replied Leonard, "but who proved to be the Earl of Rochester. He conducted me to a place of safety, thrust a purse into my hand, and left me. What you heard from your daughter was correct. As soon as I could do so with safety, I returned to my master's house. But how long have you been in London?"

"Nearly a month," replied Grant. "And now let me ask you one question. Do you ever think of Isabella?"

"Often," replied Leonard. "But as I dare not indulge the hope of a union with her, I have striven to banish her image from my mind."

"She cannot forget you, Leonard," rejoined Grant. "Now listen to me. My former plan for your aggrandizement was frustrated. I have another that cannot fail if you will adopt it. I am in possession of a monstrous design, the revelation of which will procure you whatever you desire. Ask a title from the King, and he will give it, and when in possession of that title demand the hand of the Lady Isa-bella, and her proud brother will not refuse you. Call in your porter—seize me. I will offer a feigned resistance. Convey me before the King. Make your own terms with his Majesty. He will accede to them. Will you do it?"

"No," replied Leonard, "I will not purchase the daughter at the price of the father's life."

"Heed me not," rejoined Grant, supplicatingly. "I am wholly indifferent to life; and what matters it whether I am dragged to the scaffold for one crime or another."

"I cannot consent," returned Leonard.

"Reflect," cried Grant, in an agonized tone. "A word from you will not only gain you Isabella, but save the city from destruction."

"Save the city!" exclaimed Leonard. "What mean you?"

"Swear to comply with my request, and you shall know, but not otherwise," replied Grant.

"I cannot—I cannot," rejoined Leonard; "and unfortunately you have said too much for your own safety. I must, though most reluctantly, detain you."

"Hear me, Leonard, and consider well what you do," cried Grant, planting himself before the door. "I love you next to my daughter, and chiefly because she loves you. I have told you I have a design to discover, to which I am a party,—a hellish, horrible design,—which threatens this whole city with destruction. It is your duty, having told you thus much, to arrest me, and I will offer no resistance. Will you not turn this to your own advantage? Will you not make a bargain with the King?"

"I have said I will not," rejoined Leonard.

"Then be warned by me," rejoined Grant. "Arouse your master. Pack up all your goods, and make preparations for instant flight, for the danger will invade you before you are aware of it."

"Is it fire?" demanded Leonard, upon whose mind the denunciations of Solomon Eagle now rushed.

"You will see," replied Grant, with a terrible laugh. "You will repent your determination when it is too late. Farewell."

"Hold!" cried Leonard, advancing towards him, and trying to lay hands upon him, "I arrest you in the King's name."

"Off!" exclaimed Grant, dashing him forcibly backward.

And striking down Blaize, who tried to stop him in the passage, he threw open the street door, and disappeared.

Fearful of pursuit, Grant took a circuitous route to Saint Paul's, and it was full half an hour after the interview above related, before he reached the cathedral. Just as he passed through the small door, the clock tolled forth the hour of midnight, and when he gained the mid aisle, he heard footsteps approaching, and encountered his friends.

"We had given you up," said Chowles, "and fearing you intended us some treachery, were about to do the job without you."

"I have been unavoidably detained," replied Grant. "Let us about it at once."

"I have got the fire-balls with me," observed Hubert.

"It is well," returned Grant. "Come along."

Quitting the cathedral, they proceeded to Thames-street, and tracking it to Fish-street-hill, struck off on the right into a narrow thoroughfare that brought them to Pudding-lane.

"This is the house," said Chowles, halting before a low wooden habitation, over the door of which was suspended the sign of the Wheat Sheaf, with the name THOMAS FARYNER, BAKER, inscribed beneath it.

"And here," said Hubert, "shall begin the GREAT FIRE OF LONDON."

As he said this, he gave a fire-ball to Solomon Eagle, who lighted the fuze at the end of it at Chowles's lantern. When the match was thoroughly kindled, the enthusiast approached a window of the baker's shop, and breaking a small pane of glass within it, threw the fire-ball into the room. It alighted upon a heap of faggots used for the oven, and in a few minutes all was in a blaze. The flames quickly mounted to the ceiling, and set fire to the old, dry, half-decayed timber of which it was composed.

CHAPTER LI.

THE FIRST NIGHT OF THE FIRE.

SATISFIED that the fire was fairly lighted, the incendiaries separated, having previously agreed to meet together in half an hour at the foot of London-bridge; and while the others started off in different directions, Chowles and Judith retreated to a neighbouring alley, which commanded a view of the burning habitation, and where they could confer together unobserved.

"At last the great design is executed," said Chowles. "The fire burns right merrily, and will not soon be extinguished. Who would have thought we should find such assistants as the two madmen, Solomon Eagle and Robert Hubert—and your scarcely less mad foster-brother, Philip Grant? I can understand the motives that influenced the two first to the deed, but not those of the other."

"Nor I," replied Judith, "unless he wishes in some way or other to benefit Leonard Holt by it. For my part, I shall enjoy this fire quite as much on its own account as for the plunder it will bring us. I should like to see every house in this great city destroyed."

"You are in a fair way of obtaining your wish," replied Chowles,—“but provided I have the sacking of them I don't care how many are saved. Not but that a fire is a grand sight, which I should be sorry to miss. You forget, too, that if Saint Paul's should be burnt down, we shall lose our hoards. However, there's no chance of that."

"See!" cried Judith, interrupting him. "The baker has at last discovered that his dwelling is on fire. He rushes to the window, and bursts it open. As I live, he is about to throw himself out."

As she spoke, one of the upper windows in the burning habitation was burst open, and a poor terrified wretch appeared at it in his night dress, shrieking in tones of the wildest alarm, "Fire, fire!—help, help!"

"Shall we go forward?" said Chowles.

Judith hesitated for a moment, and then assenting, they hurried towards the spot.

"Can we give you any help, friend?" cried Chowles.

"Take care of this," rejoined the baker, flinging a bag of money to the ground, "and I will endeavour to let down my wife and children. The staircase is on fire, and we are almost stifled with smoke. God help us!"

And the exclamation was followed by fearful shrieks from within, followed by the appearance of a female figure, holding two little children in her arms, at the window.

"This must be money," said Judith, utterly heedless of the fearful scene occurring above, and taking up the bag and chinking it. "Silver, by the sound. Shall we make off with it?"

"No, no," replied Chowles, "we must not run any risk for such a paltry booty as that."

At this juncture the baker, who had disappeared for a few seconds from the window, again presented himself at it, and, with some difficulty, forced a feather-bed through it, which was instantly placed by Chowles in such a position beneath as to break the fall of the descending parties. The baker then tied a couple of sheets together, and fastening one end round his wife's waist, lowered her and the children to the ground. They alighted in safety; but just as he was about to follow their example, the floor of the room fell in, and though he succeeded in springing through the window, he missed the feather bed, and broke his leg. He was picked up by Chowles and Judith, and placed upon the bed in a state of insensibility, and was soon afterwards conveyed with his family to the house of a neighbour.

Meanwhile, the fire had spread to the houses on either side of the unfortunate man's habitation, and both of them being built entirely of wood, they were almost instantly in flames. The alarm, too, had become general,—the inhabitants of the adjoining houses were filled with indescribable terror, and the narrow street was speedily crowded with persons of both sexes who had rushed from their beds to ascertain the extent of the danger. All was terror and confusion. The fire-bells of Saint Margaret's, Saint George's, and Saint Andrew's, in Botolph-lane, began to toll, and shouts were heard on every side, proving that the whole neighbourhood was roused.

To add to the general distress, a report was raised that a house in Fish-street-hill was on fire, and it was soon found to be true, as an immense volume of flames burst forth in that quarter. While the rest of the spectators, distracted by this calamity, and hardly knowing what to do, hurried in the direction of the new fire, Chowles and Judith eyed each other askance, and the former whispered to his companion, "That is another piece of Hubert's handiwork."

The two wretches now thought fit to bestir themselves. So much confusion prevailed, that they were wholly unobserved, and under the plea of rendering assistance, they entered houses and carried off whatever excited their cupidity, or was sufficiently portable. No wealthy house had been attacked as yet, and therefore their spoil was but trifling. The poor baker seemed to be the bearer of ill luck, for he had not been many minutes in his new asylum before it likewise caught fire. Another house, too, in Fish-street-hill, and lower down than the first, was observed to be on fire, and as this was out of the current of the wind, and consequently could not have been occasioned by the cloud of sparks that marked its course, a cry was instantly raised that incendiaries were abroad, and several persons were seized and secured.

But in the meantime, no efforts had been made to stop the progress of the original conflagration in Pudding-lane, which continued to rage with the greatest fury, spreading from house to house with astonishing rapidity. All the buildings in this neighbourhood being of wood, which was as dry as tinder, a spark alighting upon them would have been sufficient to set them on fire. It may be conceived, therefore, what must have been the effect of a vast volume of flame, fanned by a powerful wind. House after house caught, as if constructed of touchwood, and the fire roared and raged to such a degree, that those who stood by were too much terrified to render any effectual assistance. Indeed, the sole thought that seemed to influence all was the preservation of a portion of their property. No one regarded his neighbour, or the safety of the city. The narrow street was instantly filled with goods and furniture of all kinds, but such was the fierceness of the fire and the extraordinary rapidity with which it advanced, that the very articles attempted to be saved were seized by it, thus forming a means of its conveyance to the opposite houses.

In this way a number of persons were inclosed for a short time between two fires, and seemed in imminent danger of being burned to death. The perilous nature of their situation was, moreover, increased by a sudden and violent gust of wind, which, blowing the flames right across the street, seemed to envelope all within them. The shrieks that burst from those who were thus involved were most appalling. Fortunately, they sustained no great damage, beyond the fright and a slight scorching, for the next moment the wind shifted, and, sweeping back the flames, they were enabled to effect their retreat. Chowles and Judith were among the sufferers, and in the alarm of the moment lost all the booty they had obtained.

Soon after this the whole street was on fire. All idea of preserving their property was therefore abandoned by the inhabitants, and they thought only of saving themselves. Hundreds of half-naked persons of both sexes rushed towards Thames-street in search of a place of refuge. The scene was wholly without parallel. Many fires had occurred in London, but none that raged with such fierceness as the present conflagration, or promised to be so generally destructive. It gathered strength and fury each moment, now rising high into the air in a towering sheet of flame, now shooting forward like an enormous dragon vomiting forth streams of fire upon its foes.

All at once the flames changed colour, and were partially obscured by a thick black smoke. A large warehouse filled with resin, tar, and other combustible matters, had caught fire, and the dense vapour proceeded from the burning pitch. But it cleared off in a few minutes, and the flames burnt more brightly and fiercely than ever.

Up to this time, none of the civic authorities having arrived, several persons set off to give information of the calamity to the Lord Mayor (Sir Thomas Bludworth), and the other magistrates. A small party of the watch were on the spot, but they were unable to render any effectual assistance. As the conflagration advanced, those who occupied houses in its track quitted them, and left their goods to be a prey to the numerous plunderers, who were now gathered together pursuing their vocation like unhallowed beings amid the raging element. The whole presented a scene of the wildest terror, confusion, and licence. Vociferations, oaths, shrieks, and outcries of every description filled the air. Night was turned into day. The awful roaring of the flames was ever and anon broken low by the thundering fall of some heavy roof. Flakes of fire were scattered far and wide by the driving wind, carrying destruction wherever they alighted, and spreading the conflagration on all sides till it seemed like a vast wedge of fire driven into the heart of the city. And thus it went on, swallowing up all before it, like an insatiate monster, and roaring for very joy.

Meanwhile, the incendiaries had met, as concerted, near the foot of the bridge, and all but Philip Grant seemed to rejoice in the progress of the conflagration. Chowles made some comment upon his moody looks and silence, and whispered in his ear, "You have now an opportunity of repairing your fortune, and may make yourself richer than your son. Take my advice and do not let it pass."

"Away, tempter!" cried Grant—"I have lighted the flames of hell within my breast, and they never shall be quenched."

"Poh, poh!" rejoined Judith—"Do not turn faint-hearted now."

"The fire rages fiercely," cried Solomon Eagle, gazing at the vast sheet of flame overtopping the buildings near them, "but we must keep it alive. Take the remainder of the fire-balls, Hubert, and cast them into some of the old houses in Crooked-lane."

Hubert prepared to obey.

"I will go with you and point out the best places," said Chowles. "Our next place of rendezvous must be the vaults beneath Saint Faith's."

"Agreed!" exclaimed the others, and they again separated,—Hubert and Chowles to kindle fresh fires, and Grant to watch the conflagration at a distance. As to Solomon Eagle, he rushed towards the scene of destruction, and forcing himself into the midst of the crowd, mounted a post, crying out in a loud voice—

"Did I not tell you a second judgment would come upon you on account of your iniquities, and you now find that I avouched the truth. The Lord himself hath come to preach to you, as he did in the fiery mount of Sinai, and a terrible exhortation it shall be, and one ye shall not easily forget. This fire shall not be quenched till the whole city is laid prostrate. Ye doubted my words when I told you of the plague; ye laughed at me, and scoffed me; but ye became believers in the end, and now conviction shall be forced upon you a second time. You will vainly attempt to save your dwellings; it is the Lord's will that they should be destroyed, and all man's efforts to avert the judgment will be ineffectual."

While the majority listened to the discourse with fear and trembling, and regarded the speaker as a prophet, a few took the opposite view of the question, and regarding him as an impostor and incendiary, cried out—"He has set fire to our houses. Down with him! Down with him!"

Other voices joined in this outcry, and an attempt was made to carry the menace into effect, but a strong party rallied round the enthusiast, who derided the futile attempt of his opponents. Planting himself near the principal entrance of Saint Margaret's church, he continued to pour forth exhortations to the crowd, until he was driven into the interior of the pile, where he proceeded with his discourse, by the fast-approaching flames. The whole body of the church was filled with poor wretches who had sought refuge within it, and had brought with them such of their goods as they were able to carry off. But it soon became evident that the sacred structure would be destroyed, and their screams and cries on quitting it were piteous to hear. Solomon Eagle was the last to go forth, and he delayed his departure till the flames burst through the windows. Another great storehouse of oil, tar, cordage, hemp, flax, and other highly inflammable articles, adjoining the church, had caught fire, and the flames speedily reached the sacred fabric. The glass within the windows was shattered; the stone bars split asunder; and the seats and other wood-work within catching fire, the flames ascended to the roof, and kindled its massive rafters.

Great efforts were now made to check the fire. A few of the cumbrous and unmanageable engines of the day were brought to the spot, but no water could be obtained. All the aqueducts, pipes, and sluices were dry, and the great engine on the bridge, called the Thames Water-tower, was found to be out of order, and the pipes connected with it empty. To add to the calamity, the tide was out, and it was not only difficult, but dangerous, to obtain water from the river. The scanty supply served rather to increase than check the flames.

All sorts of rumours prevailed among the crowd. It was not doubted that the fire, which kept continually breaking out in fresh places, was certainly the work of incendiaries, and it was now supposed that it must have been caused by the French or the Dutch, with both of which nations the country was then at war, and the most fearful anticipations of a sudden invasion were entertained. Some conjectured it might be the work of the Papists, and it chancing that a professor of that religion was discovered among the mob, he was with difficulty rescued from their fury by the watch, and conveyed to Newgate. Other persons, who were likewise suspected of being incendiaries, were conveyed with him.

This, though it satisfied the multitude, did not check the progress of the fire, nor put a stop to the terror and tumult that prevailed. Every moment a fresh family were turned into the street, and by their cries added to the confusion. The plunderers had formed themselves into bands, pillaging everything they could lay hands on,—carrying off boxes, goods, and coffers, breaking into cellars, broaching casks of spirits and ale, and emptying flasks of wine. Hundreds of persons who did not join in the pillage made free with the contents of the cellars, and a large portion of the concourse was soon in the wildest state of intoxication.

Thus, wild laughter and exclamations of frenzied joy were heard amid the wailings of women, and the piteous cries of children. It was indeed dreadful to see old and bed-ridden people forced into the street to seek a home where they could; nor yet less dreadful to see others roused from a bed of sickness at dead of night, and by such a fearful summons.

Still, fanned by the wind, and fed by a thousand combustible matters, the fire pressed fearfully on, devouring all before it, and increasing in fury and power each instant; while the drunken mob laughed, roared, shouted, and blasphemed beside it as if in emulation of the raging flames.

When Philip Grant quitted Leonard in the manner before related, the latter followed him to the door, and saw him disappear in the gloom. But he did not pursue him, because he could not believe that any danger was really to be apprehended, but attributed the mysterious council he had received to the distempered imagination of the unfortunate man. He, however, thought it advisable to consult with Mr. Bloundel on the subject, and accordingly proceeded to his room and roused him.

After hearing what had occurred, the grocer looked very grave, and said, "I am not disposed to treat this matter so lightly as you do, Leonard. I fear this unhappy man has some desperate design in view. What it is I cannot—dare not—conjecture. But I confess I am full of apprehension. I shall not retire to rest tonight, but shall hold myself in readiness to act in whatever way may be necessary. You had better go forth, and if anything occurs, give notice to the proper authorities. We have not now such a Lord Mayor as we had during the season of the plague. The firm and courageous Sir John Lawrence, who does infinite honour to our worshipful company, is but ill succeeded by the weak and vacillating Sir Thomas Bludworth. Still the latter may be equal to this emergency, and if anything happens you must apply to him."

"I will follow your advice," rejoined Leonard; "at the same time, I think there is nothing to apprehend."

"Time will show," observed the grocer.

Shortly after this, Leonard sallied forth, and having determined what course to pursue in the first instance, proceeded to Saint Paul's. He found every door in the old building fast closed. Not satisfied with this, he knocked at the great northern entrance till the summons was answered by a verger, and he demanded to be admitted, and to search the cathedral, as well as Saint Faith's. The verger offered no objection, and Leonard having spent upwards of an hour in a vain search, quitted the cathedral.

More than ever convinced that he was right in his supposition, and that no danger was to be apprehended, he was about to return home, when the idea occurred to him that he might perhaps find Grant at the plague-pit in Finsbury Fields, and he accordingly shaped his course thither. It was long since he had visited that melancholy spot, and it was not without much internal perturbation that he approached the vast mound covering the victims of the pestilence. But no one was there, and though he paced round and round the dreary inclosure for some time, no one came. He then proceeded to the lesser plague-pit, and kneeling beside the grave of Amabel, bedewed it with his tears.

At last he arose, and was about to return to Wood-street, when he observed an extraordinary light in the sky a little to the left, evidently produced by the reflection of a great fire in that direction. No sooner did he behold this light than he said to himself, "Mr. Bloundel was right. That is the danger with which the city was threatened. It is now too late to avert it."

Determined, however, to ascertain the extent of the calamity without an instant loss of time, he set off at a swift pace, and, marking the direction of the fire, shaped his course towards it.

In half an hour after quitting Finsbury-fields, he reached Fish-street-hill, and stood beside the terrible conflagration. It was then little more than two o'clock, and already a vast chasm of blackening ruins proclaimed the devastation that had been committed. Just as he arrived, the roof of Saint Margaret's fell in with a tremendous crash, and for a few minutes the fire was subdued. It then arose with greater fury than ever; burst out on both sides of the sacred structure; and caught the line of houses leading towards London-bridge. The first house was that of a vintner: it instantly blazed up, and burnt with such intensity that the adjoining habitation was presently in flames.

"I know who has done all this," exclaimed Leonard, half involuntarily, as he gazed at the work of destruction before him. "I know who has done it," he repeated.

"Indeed," exclaimed a by-stander, gazing at him, "Who is it? the Dutchman or the Frenchman?"

"Neither," replied Leonard, who at that moment discovered Grant among the group opposite him, "Yonder stands the incendiary!"

CHAPTER LII.

PROGRESS OF THE CONFLAGRATION.

GRANT was instantly surrounded and seized by the mob. He offered no resistance, but demanded to be led with his accuser before a magistrate. Almost as the words were uttered, a cry was raised that the Lord Mayor and the sheriffs were coming along Eastcheap, and the prisoner and Leonard were immediately hurried off in that direction. They met the civic authorities at the corner of Saint Clement's-lane; but instead of paying any attention to them, the Lord Mayor, who appeared to be in a state of great agitation and excitement, ordered the javelin men by whom he was attended to push the mob aside.

"I will not delay your worship an instant," cried Leonard—"but this dreadful fire is the work of incendiaries, of whom that man," pointing to Grant, "is the principal. I pray your worship to question him. He may have important revelations to make."

"Eh, what?" cried the Lord Mayor, addressing Grant. "Is it true you are an incendiary? Who are your accomplices? Where are they?"

"I have none," replied Grant, boldly,—"I deny the charge altogether. Let my accuser prove it if he can."

"You hear what he says, young man," said the Mayor. "Did you see him set fire to any house? Did you find any fireballs on his person?"

"I did not," replied Leonard.

"I searched him your worship," cried Chowles, who was among the bystanders, "the moment he was seized, and found nothing upon him. It is a false and malicious charge."

"It looks like it, I must say," replied the Mayor. "On what grounds do you accuse him?" he added, angrily, to Leonard.

"On these," replied Leonard. "He came to me three hours ago, and confessed that he had a desperate design against the safety of the city, and made certain proposals to me, to which I would not listen. This is not the season for a full explanation of the matter. But I pray your worship, as you value the welfare of the city, to have him secured."

"There can be no harm in that," replied the Mayor. "His appearance is decidedly against him. Let him be taken care of till the morrow, when I will examine further into the matter. Your name and place of abode, young man?"

"I am called Leonard Holt, and my business is that of a grocer, in Wood-street," was the reply.

"Enough," rejoined the Mayor. "Take away the prisoner. I will hear nothing further now. Lord! Lord! how the fire rages, to be sure. We shall have the whole city burnt down if we do not take care."

"That we shall indeed," replied one of the sheriffs, "unless the most prompt and decisive measures are immediately adopted."

"What would you recommend?" cried the Lord Mayor, despairingly.

The sheriff looked perplexed by the question.

"If I might offer an opinion," interposed Leonard, "I would advise your lordship to pull down all the houses in the way of the fire, as the only means of checking it."

"Pull down the houses!" cried the Lord Mayor. "Who ever heard of such an idea? Why, that would be worse than the fire. No, no; that will never do."

"The young man is in the right," observed the sheriff who had just spoken.

"Well, well—we shall see," replied the Mayor. "But we are losing time here. Forward! forward!"

And while Grant was borne off to Newgate by a guard of javelin-men, the Lord Mayor and his company proceeded to Fish-street-hill, where the whole conflagration burst upon them. The moment the Lord Mayor appeared, he was beset on all sides by hundreds of families, who solicited his protection. Others came to give him the alarming intelligence that a very scanty supply of water only could be obtained, and that already two engines had been destroyed, while the firemen who worked them had narrowly escaped with life. Others again pressed him for instructions how to act,—some suggesting one plan,—some another,—and being of a weak and irresolute character, and utterly unequal to a fearful emergency like the present, he was completely bewildered. Bidding the houseless families to take refuge in the churches, he ordered certain officers to attend them, and affecting to doubt the statement of those who affirmed there was no water, advised them to go to the river, where they would find plenty. In vain they assured him the tide was out, the Thames Water Tower empty, the pipes and conduits dry. He would not believe anything of the sort, but, upbraiding his informants with neglect, bade them try again. As to instructions, he could give none.

At last, a reluctant assent was wrung from him by the sheriff that a house should be pulled down, as suggested by Leonard, and preparations were instantly made for putting the design in execution. The house selected was about four doors from the top of Fish-street-hill, and belonged to a bird-cage-maker. But they encountered an unexpected opposition. Having ascertained their purpose, the owner fastened his doors, and refused to admit them. He harangued the mob from one of the upper windows, and producing a pistol, threatened to fire upon them if they attempted to gain a forcible entrance. The officers, however, having received their orders, were not to be intimidated and commenced breaking down the door. The bird-cage-maker then fired, but without effect; and before he had time to reload, the door had yielded to the combined efforts of the multitude, who were greatly enraged at his strange conduct. They rushed up stairs, and finding he had locked himself in the room, left him there, and commenced the work of demolition. More than a hundred men were engaged in the task, but, though they used the utmost exertion, they had little more than unroofed the building when a cry was raised by those in the street that the house was on fire. Alarmed by the shout they descended, and found the report true: Flames were issuing from the room lately occupied by the bird-cage maker. The wretch had set fire to his dwelling, and then made his escape with his family by a back staircase. Thus defeated, the workmen, with bitter imprecations on the fugitive, withdrew, and Leonard, who had lent his best assistance to the task, repaired to the Lord Mayor. He found him in greater consternation than ever.

"We must go further off if we would do any good," said Leonard, "and as the present plan is evidently too slow, we must have recourse to gunpowder."

"Gunpowder!" exclaimed the Lord Mayor. "Would you blow up the city, like a second Guy Fawkes? I begin to suspect you are one of the incendiaries yourself, young man. Lord, Lord! what will become of us?"

"If your worship disapproves of my suggestion, at least give orders what is to be done," rejoined Leonard.

"I have done all I can," replied the Mayor. "Who are you that talk to me thus?"

"I have told your worship I am a simple tradesman," replied Leonard. "But I have the welfare of the city at heart, and I cannot stand by and see it burnt to the ground without an effort to save it."

"Well, well, I daresay you mean very well, young man," rejoined the Lord Mayor, somewhat pacified. "But don't you perceive it's impossible to stop such a fire as this without water, and without engines. I'm sure I would willingly lay down my life to preserve the city. But what can I do—what can any man do?"

"Much may be done if there is resolution to do it," returned Leonard. "I would recommend your worship to proceed, in the first place, to the wharfs on the banks of the Thames, and cause the removal of the wood, coal, and other combustible matter with which they are crowded."

"Well thought of," cried the Lord Mayor. "I will go thither at once. Do you stay here. Your advice will be useful. I will examine you touching the incendiary to-morrow—that is, if we are any of us left alive, which I don't expect. Lord, Lord! what will become of us."

And with many similar ejaculations, he hurried off with the sheriffs, and the greater part of his attendants, and taking his way down Saint Martin's-lane, soon reached the river side.

By this time the fire had approached the summit of Fish-street-hill, and here the overhanging stories of the houses coming so close together as almost to meet at the top, the flames speedily caught the other side, and spread the conflagration in that direction. Two other houses were likewise discovered to be on fire in Crooked-lane, and in an incredibly short space the whole dense mass of habitations, lying at the west side of Fish-street-hill, and between Crooked-lane and Eastcheap, were in flames, and threatening the venerable church of Saint Michael, which stood in the midst of them, with instant destruction. To the astonishment of all who witnessed it, the conflagration seemed to proceed as rapidly against the wind as with it, and to be approaching Thames-street, both by Pudding-lane and Saint Michael's-lane. A large stable, filled with straw and hay, at the back of the Star Inn, in Little Eastcheap, had caught fire, and carrying the conflagration eastward, had already conveyed it as far as Botolph-lane.

It chanced that a poor Catholic priest, travelling from Douay to England, had landed that night, and taken up his quarters at the Star Inn, above mentioned. The landlord, who had been roused by the cries of fire, and alarmed by the rumours of incendiaries, immediately called to mind this guest, and dragging him from his room, thrust him, half naked, into the street. Stating his suspicions, that the poor priest was an incendiary, to the mob without, they seized him, and in spite of his protestations and explanations, which being uttered in a foreign tongue, they could not comprehend, they were about to exercise summary punishment upon him, and to hang him to the sign-post before the landlord's door, when they were diverted from their dreadful purpose by Solomon Eagle, who prevailed upon them to convey him to Newgate.

The conflagration had now assumed so terrific a character, that it appalled even the stoutest spectator. It has been mentioned that for many weeks previous to the direful calamity, the weather had been remarkably dry and warm, a circumstance which had prepared the old wooden houses, abounding in this part of the city, to ignite. Added to this, if the incendiaries themselves had deposited combustible materials in the best places for extending the conflagration, they could not have done so more effectually than actually fell out. All sorts of inflammable goods were contained in the shops and warehouses,—oil, hemp, flax, pitch, tar, cordage, sugar, wine, and spirits; and when any magazine of this sort caught fire it spread the conflagration with tenfold rapidity.

The heat of the flames had now become almost insufferable, and the sparks and flakes of fire fell so fast and thick that the spectators were compelled to retreat to a considerable distance from the burning buildings. The noise occasioned by the cracking of the timbers, and the falling of walls and roofs, was awful in the extreme. All the avenues and thoroughfares near the fire were now choked up by carts, coaches, and other vehicles which had been hastily brought thither to take away the goods of the inhabitants, and the hurry of the poor people to save a wreck of their property, and the attempts made by the gangs of plunderers to carry it off, constituted a scene of unparalleled tumult and confusion. As yet, no troops had appeared to maintain order, and seeing that as much mischief was almost done by the plunderers as by the fire, Leonard determined to go in search of the Lord Mayor, and acquaint him with the mischief that was occurring. Having heard that the fire had already reached London-bridge, he determined to ascertain whether the report was true. As he proceeded down Saint Michael's-lane, he found the venerable church on fire, and with some difficulty forcing his way through the crowd, reached Thames-street, where he discovered that the conflagration had even made more fearful progress than he had anticipated. Fishmongers' Hall, a large square structure, was on fire, and burning swiftly,—the flames encircling its high roof, and the turret by which it was surmounted. Streams of fire, too, had darted down the numerous narrow alleys leading to the riverside, and had kindled the heaps of wood and coal with which they were crowded. The party under the command of the Lord Mayor had used their utmost exertions to get rid of these combustible materials by flinging them into the Thames; but they came too late, and were driven away by the approach of the fire. Most of the barges and heavy craft were aground, and they, too, caught fire, and were burned, with their contents.

Finding he could neither render any assistance, nor obtain speech with the Lord Mayor, and anxious to behold the terrible, yet sublime spectacle from the river, Leonard hastened to Old Swan-stairs, and springing into a boat, ordered the waterman to row into the middle of the Thames. He then could discern the full extent of the fire, and trace the progress it was making. Every house between Fishmongers'-hall and the bridge was on fire, and behind them rose a vast roaring sheet of flame. Saint Magnus's Church, at the foot of the bridge, was next seized by the flames, and Leonard watched its destruction. An ancient gateway followed, and soon afterwards a large stack of houses that loaded the bridge, burst into flames.

The inhabitants of the houses on the bridge, having now become thoroughly alarmed, flung bedding, boxes, and articles of furniture, out of their windows into the river. A crowd of boats surrounded the starlings of the bridge, and the inhabitants, descending to them by the staircases in the interior of the piers, embarked with every article they could carry off. The river presented a most extraordinary scene. Lighted by the red and fierce reflection of the fire, and covered with boats, filled with families who had just quitted their habitations either on the bridge or in some other street adjoining it, its whole surface was speckled with pieces of furniture, or goods that had been cast into it, and which were now floating up with the tide. Great crowds were collected on the Southwark shore to watch the conflagration, while on the opposite side the wharfs and quays were thronged with persons removing their goods, and embarking them in boats. One circumstance, which has been noted by Pepys, and which also struck Leonard, was the singular attachment displayed by the pigeons, which were kept by the owners of several houses on the bridge, to the spots they had been accustomed to. Even when the flames attacked the buildings to which the doves were attached, the birds wheeled round and round them, until their pinions being scorched by the fire, they dropped into the water.

Leonard remained on the river nearly two hours. He could not, in fact, tear himself away from the spectacle, which possessed a strange fascination in his eyes. He began to think that all the efforts of men were unavailing to arrest the progress of destruction, and he was for a while content to regard it as a mere spectacle. And never had he beheld a more impressive—a more terrible sight. There lay the vast and populous city before him, which he had once before known to be invaded by an invisible, but exterminating hand, now attacked by a furious and far seen enemy. The fire seemed to form a vast arch—many-coloured as a rainbow,—reflected and again reflected, in all its horrible splendour, in the river.

Nor was the aspect of the city itself less striking. The innumerable towers and spires of the churches rose tall and dark through the wavering sheet of flame, and every now and then one of them would topple down and disappear, as if swallowed up by the devouring element. For a short space, the fire seemed to observe a regular, progressive movement, but when it fell upon better material, it reared its blazing crest aloft, changed its hues, and burnt with double intensity. Leonard watched it thread narrow alleys, and, firing every lesser habitation in its course, kindle some great hall or other structure, whose remoteness seemed to secure it from immediate danger. At this distance the roaring of the flames resembled that of a thousand furnaces. Ever and anon it was broken by a sound like thunder, occasioned by the fall of some mighty edifice. Then there would come a quick succession of reports, like the discharge of artillery, followed by a shower of fiery flakes and sparks blown aloft, like the explosion of some stupendous firework. Mixed with the roaring of the flames, the thunder of falling roofs, the cracking of timber, was a wild hubbub of human voices, that sounded afar off like a dismal wail. In spite of its terror, the appearance of the fire was at times beautiful beyond description. Its varying colours,—its fanciful forms,—now shooting out in a hundred different directions, like lightning flashes,—now drawing itself up as it were, and soaring aloft,—now splitting into a thousand tongues of flame,—these aspects so rivetted the attention of Leonard, that he almost forgot in the sight the dreadful devastation that was going forward. His eyes almost ached with gazing at the fiery spectacle, and he was glad to rest them on the black masses of building that stood in stern relief against it, and which there could be little doubt would soon become its prey.

It was now broad daylight, except for the mighty cloud of smoke which o'er-canopied the city, creating an artificial gloom. Leonard's troubled gaze wandered from the scene of destruction to Saint Paul's,—an edifice which, from the many events that had occurred there, had always a special interest in his eyes. Calling to mind the denunciations poured forth by Solomon Eagle against this fane, he could not help fearing they would now be fulfilled. What added to his misgivings was, that it was now almost entirely surrounded by poles and scaffolding. Ever since the cessation of the plague, the repairs, which had been suspended during that awful season, had been recommenced under the superintendence of Doctor Christopher Wren, and were now proceeding with renewed activity. The whole of the building was under repair, and a vast number of masons were employed upon it, and it was their scaffoldings which now impressed Leonard with a dread afterwards fully justified by the result. Accustomed to connect the figure of Solomon Eagle with the sacred structure, he could not help fancying that he discovered a speck resembling a human figure on the central tower. If it were the enthusiast, what must his feelings be at finding his prediction so fatally fulfilled. Little did he think how the prophecy had been accomplished.

But his attention was speedily recalled to the progress of the conflagration. From the increased tumult in the city, it was evident the inhabitants were now thoroughly roused, and actively bestirring themselves to save their property. This was apparent, even on the river, from the multitude of boats, deeply laden with goods of all kinds, which were now seen shaping their course towards Westminster. The fire, also, had made rapid progress on all sides. The vast pile of habitations at the north side of the bridge was now entirely in flames. The effect of this was awfully fine. Not only did the flames mount to a great height and appear singularly conspicuous from the situation of the houses, but every instant some blazing fragment fell with a tremendous splash into the water, where it hissed for a moment and then was for ever quenched, floating a black mass upon the surface. From the foot of the bridge, to Coal-harbour-stairs, extended what Dryden finely calls "a quay of fire." All the wharfs and warehouses had caught fire, and burnt with astonishing rapidity, while this part of Thames-street, "the lodge of all combustibles," was burning with equal fury. The fire, too, had spread in an easterly direction, and consuming three churches, namely, Saint Andrew's, in Botolph-lane, Saint Mary's, in Love-lane, and Saint Dunstan's-in-the-East, had invaded Tower-street, and seemed fast approaching the ancient fortress.

So fascinated was Leonard by the sight that he could have been well content to remain all day gazing at it, but he now reflected that he had other duties to perform, and directing the waterman to land him at Queenhithe, ascended Bread-street-hill, and betook himself to Wood-street.

CHAPTER LIII.

LEONARD'S INTERVIEW WITH THE KING.

SOME rumours of the conflagration, as will be supposed, had ere this reached Mr. Bloundel, but he had no idea of the extent of the direful calamity, and when informed of it by Leonard, he lifted up his hands despairingly, exclaiming in accents of the deepest affliction :—"Another judgment, then, has fallen upon this sinful city,—another judgment yet more terrible than the first. Man may have kindled this great fire, but the hand of God is apparent in it. 'Alas ! alas ! for thee, thou great city, Babylon ! Alas for thee, thou mighty city ! for in one hour is thy judgment come. The kings of the earth shall bewail thee, and lament for thee, when they see the smoke of thy burning.'"

"Your dwelling was spared in the late visitation, sir," observed Leonard, after a pause, "and you were able to shut yourself up, as in a strong castle, against the all-extermimating foe. But I fear you will not be able to ward off the assaults of the present enemy, and recommend you to remove your family and goods without delay to some place of security far from this doomed city."

"This is the Lord's day, Leonard, and must be kept holy," replied the grocer. "To-morrow, if I am spared so long, I will endeavour to find some place of shelter."

"If the conflagration continues to spread as rapidly as it is now doing, to-morrow will be too late," rejoined Leonard.

"If may be so," returned the grocer, "but I will not violate the Sabbath. If the safety of my family is threatened, that is another matter, but I will not attempt to preserve my goods. Do not, however, let me influence you. Take such portion of our stock as belongs to you, and you know that a third of the whole is yours, and convey it where you please."

"On no account, sir," interrupted Leonard. "I should never think of acting in opposition to your wishes. This will be a sad Sunday for London."

"The saddest she has ever seen," replied the grocer, "for though the voice of prayer was silenced in her churches during the awful season of the plague, yet then men's minds had been gradually prepared for the calamity, and though filled with terror, they were not taken by surprise, as must now be the case. But let us to prayers, and may our earnest supplications avail in turning aside the Divine displeasure."

And summoning his family and household, all of whom were by this time stirring, and in the utmost consternation at what they had heard of the fire, he commenced a prayer, adapted to the occasion, in a strain of the utmost fervour; and as Leonard gazed at his austere countenance, now lighted up with holy zeal, and listened to his earnest intercessions in behalf of the devoted city, he was reminded of the prophet Jeremiah weeping for Jerusalem before the throne of grace.

Prayers over, the whole party sat down to their morning repast, after which, the grocer and his eldest son, accompanied by Leonard and Blaiz, mounted to the roof of the house, and gazing in the direction of the conflagration, they could plainly distinguish the vast cloud of yellow smoke commingled with flame, that marked the scene of its ravages. As the wind blew from this quarter, charged, as has been stated, with a cloud of sparks and fire-drops, many of them were dashed in their faces, and compelled them to shade their eyes. The same awful roar which Leonard had heard on the river, likewise broke upon their ears, while from all the adjoining streets arose a wild clamour of human voices, the burden of whose cries was "fire ! fire !" The church bells, which should have been tolling to early devotions, were now loudly ringing the alarm, while their towers were crowded, as were the roofs of most of the houses, with persons gazing towards the scene of devastation. Nothing could be more opposite to the stillness of a Sabbath morn, and as the grocer listened to the noise and tumult prevailing around him, he could not repress a groan.

"I never thought my ears would be so much offended on this day," he said. "Let us go down. I have seen and heard enough."

They then descended, and Stephen Bloundel, who was greatly alarmed by what he had just witnessed, strongly urged his father to remove immediately.

"There are seasons," said the young man, "when even our duty to Heaven becomes a secondary consideration, and I should be sorry if the fruit of your industry were sacrificed to your religious scruples."

"There are no such seasons," replied the grocer, severely, "and I grieve that a son of mine should think so. If the inhabitants of this sinful city had not broken the Sabbath, and neglected God's commandments, this heavy judgment would not have fallen upon them. I shall neglect no precaution for the personal safety of my family, but I place my worldly goods in the hands of Him from whom I derived them, and to whom I am ready to restore them, whenever it shall please Him to take them."

"I stand rebuked, father," replied Stephen, humbly; "and entreat your pardon for having ventured to differ with you. I am now fully sensible of the propriety of your conduct."

"And I have ever acquiesced in your wishes, be they what they may," said Mrs. Bloundel to her husband, "but I confess I am dreadfully frightened. I hope you will remove the first thing to-morrow."

"When midnight has struck, and the Sabbath is past, I shall commence my preparations," replied the grocer. "You must rest content till then."

Mrs. Bloundel heaved a sigh, but said no more, and the grocer, retiring to a side table, opened the Bible, and sat down calmly to its perusal. But though no further remonstrances reached his ears, there was no lack of murmuring in the kitchen on the part of Blaize and Patience.

"Goodness knows what will become of us!" cried the latter. "I expect we shall all be burnt alive, owing to our master's obstinacy. What harm can there be in moving on a Sunday, I should like to know? I'm sure I'm too much hurried and flurried to say my prayers as I ought to do."

"And so am I," replied Blaize. "Our old master is a great deal too particular. What a dreadful thing it would be if the house should be burnt down, and all my mother's savings, which were to form a provision for our marriage, lost."

"That would be terrible, indeed," cried Patience, with a look of dismay. "I think the wedding had better take place as soon as the fire is over. It can't last many days, if it goes on at this rate."

"You are right," returned Blaize. "I have no objection. I'll speak to my mother at once." And stepping into the scullery, where old Josyna was washing some dishes, he addressed her—"Mother, I'm sadly afraid lest this great fire should reach us before our master will allow us to move. Hadn't you better let me take care of the money you intended giving me on my marriage with Patience?"

"No, no, myn goed zoon," replied Josyna, shaking her head—"I musd zee you married virst."

"But I can't be married to-day," cried Blaize—"and there's no time to lose. The fire will be upon us directly."

"I cand help dat," returned his mother. "We must place our trust in God."

"There I quite agree with you, mother," replied Blaize—"but we must also take care of ourselves. If you won't give me the money, at least have it ready to carry off at a moment's notice."

"Don't be afraid, myn zoon," replied Josyna. "I won't forged id."

"I'm sadly afraid you will though," muttered Blaize, as he walked away. "There's no doing any good with her," he added to Patience. "She's as obstinate as Mr. Bloundel. I should like to see the fire of all things, but I suppose I mustn't leave the house."

"Of course not," replied Patience, pettishly; "at such a time, it would be highly improper. I forbid that."

"Then of course I must submit," groaned Blaize,—
"I can't even have my own way before marriage."

When the proper time arrived, Mr. Bloundel accompanied by all his family and household, except old Josyna, who was left in charge of the house, repaired to the neighbouring church of Saint Aiban's, but finding the doors closed, and that no service was to be performed, he returned home with a sorrowful heart.

Soon after this, Leonard took Mr. Bloundel apart, and observed to him, "I have a strong conviction that I might be useful in arresting the progress of the conflagration, and as I cannot attend church service, I will, with your permission, devote myself to that object. It is my intention to proceed to Whitehall, and if possible, obtain an audience of the King, and if I succeed in doing so, to lay a plan before him, which I think would prove efficacious."

"I will not ask you what the plan is," rejoined the grocer, "because I doubt its success. Neither will I oppose your design, which is praiseworthy. Go and may it prosper. Return in the evening, for I may need your assistance,—perhaps, protection,—to-night."

Leonard readily assented, and prepared to set forth. Blaize begged hard to accompany him, but was refused. Forcing his way through the host of carts, coaches, drays, and other vehicles that thronged the streets, Leonard made the best of his way to Whitehall, where he speedily arrived. A large body of mounted troopers were drawn up before the gates of the palace, and a regiment of the foot-guards were stationed in the court. Drums were beating to arms, and other martial sounds were heard, betokening that all were on the alert. Leonard was stopped at the gate by a sentinel, who refused to admit him, and he would in all probability have been turned back, if at that moment the Lords Argentine and Rochester had not come up. On seeing him, the former frowned, and passed quickly on, but the latter halted.

"You seem to be in some difficulty," remarked Rochester. "Can I help you?"

Leonard was about to turn away, but he checked himself.

"I will not suffer my feelings of resentment to operate injuriously to others," he muttered. "I desire to see the king, my lord," he added, to the Earl. "I have a proposal to make to him, which I think would be a means of checking the conflagration."

"Say you so!" cried Rochester. "Come with me then. Heaven grant your plan may prove successful, in which case, I promise you, you shall be nobly rewarded."

"I seek no reward, my lord," replied Leonard. "All I desire is to save the city."

"Well, well," rejoined Rochester, "it will be time enough to refuse his Majesty's bounty when it is offered."

Upon this, he ordered the sentinel to withdraw, and Leonard followed him into the palace. They found the entrance-hall filled with groups of officers and attendants, all conversing together, it was evident from their looks, and manner, on one engrossing topic,—the fire.

Having ascended a magnificent staircase, and traversed part of a grand gallery, they entered an ante-room, in which a number of courtiers and pages,—amongst the latter of whom was Chiffinch,—were assembled. At the door of the inner chamber stood a couple of ushers, and as the Earl approached, it was instantly thrown open. As Leonard, however, who followed close behind his leader, passed Chiffinch, the latter caught hold of his arm and detained him. Hearing the movement, Rochester turned, and said quickly to the page, "Let him pass, he is going with me."

"Old Rowley is in no humour for a jest to day, my lord," replied Chiffinch, familiarly. "He is more serious than I have ever seen him before, and takes this fire sadly to heart, as well he may. Mr. Secretary Pepys, of the Admiralty, is with him, and is detailing all particulars of the calamity to him, I believe."

"It is in reference to the fire that I have brought this young man to him," returned the Earl. "Let him pass, I say. State your plan boldly," he added, as they entered the audience-room.

At the further end of the long room, on a chair of state, and beneath a canopy, sat Charles. He was evidently much disturbed, and looked eagerly at the new comers, especially at Leonard, expecting to find him the bearer of some important intelligence. On the right of the King, and near an open window, which, looking towards the river, commanded a view of the fire on the bridge, and of part of that in the city, stood the Duke of York. The Duke did not appear much concerned at the calamity, but was laughing with Lord Argentine, who stood close beside him. The smile fled from the lips of the latter as he beheld Leonard, and he looked angrily at Rochester, who did not, however, appear to notice his displeasure. On the left of the royal chair was Mr. Pepys, engaged, as Chiffinch had intimated, in detailing to the King the progress of the conflagration; and next to the secretary stood the Earl of Craven,—a nobleman who, though somewhat stricken in years, still retained a handsome and commanding exterior. Three other noblemen—namely, the Lords Hollis, Arlington, and Ashley,—were likewise present.

"Who have you with you, Rochester?" demanded Charles, as the Earl and his companion approached him.

"A young man, my liege, who desires to make known to you a plan for checking this conflagration," replied the Earl.

"Ah!" exclaimed the King. "Let him accomplish that for us, and he shall ask what he will in return."

"I ventured to promise him as much," observed Rochester.

"Mine is a very simple, and very obvious plan, your Majesty," said Leonard, "but I will engage, on the peril of my life, if you will give me sufficient authority,—and means to work withal, to stop the further progress of this fire."

"In what way?" asked Charles, impatiently. "In what way?"

"By blowing up the houses around the conflagration," replied Leonard.

"A short and summary process, truly," replied the King. "But it would occasion great waste of property, and might be attended with other serious consequences."

"Not half so much property will be destroyed as if the slower and seemingly safer course of pulling down the houses is pursued, your Majesty," rejoined Leonard. "That experiment has been tried and failed."

"I am of the young man's opinion," observed the Earl of Craven.

"And I," replied Pepys. "Better lose half the city than the whole. As it is, your Majesty is not safe in your palace."

"Why, you do not think it can reach Whitehall?" cried the King, rising and walking to the window. "How say you, brother?" he added, to the Duke of York—"shall we act upon this young man's suggestion, and order the wholesale destruction of the buildings which he recommends?"

"I would not advise your Majesty to do so,—at least, not without consideration," answered the Duke. "This is a terrible fire, no doubt, but the danger may be greatly exaggerated, and if any ill consequences should result from the proposed scheme, the blame will be entirely laid upon your Majesty."

"I care not for that," replied the King, "provided I felt it were for the best."

"The plan would do incalculably more mischief, than the fire itself," observed Lord Argentine, "and would be met by the most determined opposition on the part of the owners of the habitations condemned to destruction. Whole streets will have to be blown up, and your Majesty will easily comprehend the confusion and damage that will ensue."

"I am decidedly of Lord Argentine's opinion," said the Duke of York.

"I advise your Majesty to amuse yourself, like Nero, while your city is burning," remarked Rochester sarcastically.

"Another such jest, my lord," rejoined the King, sternly, "and it shall cost you your liberty. I will go upon the river instantly, and view the fire myself, and then decide what course shall be adopted."

"There are rumours that incendiaries are abroad, your Majesty," remarked Argentine, glancing maliciously at Leonard,—“and it is not unlikely that he who lighted the fire should best know how to extinguish it.”

"His lordship says truly," rejoined Leonard. "There are incendiaries abroad, and the chief of them was taken by my hand, and lodged in Newgate, where he lies for examination."

"Ha!" exclaimed the King, furiously. "Did you catch the miscreant in the fact?"

"No, my liege," replied Leonard, "but he came to me a few hours before the outbreak of the fire, and intimated that he was in possession of a plot against the city,—a design so monstrous, that your Majesty would give any reward to the discloser of it. He proposed to reveal this plot to me on certain terms."

"And you accepted them?" cried the King.

"No, my liege," replied Leonard. "I refused them, and would have secured him, but he escaped me at that time. I afterwards discovered him among the spectators, near the fire, and caused him to be arrested."

"And who is this villain?" cried the King.

"I must refer your Majesty to Lord Argentine," replied Leonard.

"Do you know anything of the transaction, my lord?" said Charles, appealing to him.

"Not I, your Majesty," said Argentine, vainly endeavouring to conceal his anger and confusion. "The knave has spoken falsely."

"He shall rue it, if he has done so," rejoined the monarch. "What has the man you speak of to do with Lord Argentine," he added, to Leonard.

"He is his father," was the reply.

Charles looked at Lord Argentine, and became convinced from the altered expression of his countenance, that the truth had been spoken. He, therefore, arose, and motioning him to follow him, led him into the recess of a window, where they remained in conversation for some minutes. While this was passing, the Earl of Rochester observed, in an under-tone, to Leonard, "You have made a mortal foe in Lord Argentine, but I will protect you."

"I can protect myself, my lord," rejoined Leonard coldly.

Shortly after this, Charles stepped forward with a graver aspect than before, and said, "Before proceeding to view this conflagration, I must give some directions in reference to it. To you, my Lord Craven, whose intrepidity I well know, I intrust the most important post. You will station yourself at the east of the conflagration, and if you find it making its way to the Tower, as I hear is the case, check it at all hazards. The old fortress must be preserved at any risk. But do not use gunpowder, except in this case, without my further orders. Lords Hollis and Ashley, you will have the care of the north-west of the city. Station yourselves near Newgate-market. Rochester and Arlington, your posts will be near Saint Paul's. Watch over the august cathedral. I would not have it injured for half my kingdom. Brother," he added to the Duke of York, "you can accompany me in my barge,—and you, Mr. Pepys. You, young man," to Leonard, "can follow in my train."

"Has your Majesty no post for me?" asked Argentine.

"No," replied Charles, turning coldly from him.

"Had not your Majesty better let him have the custody of your gaol of Newgate?" remarked Rochester, sarcastically.

Lord Argentine turned deadly pale, but he made no answer.

Attended by the Duke of York, and Mr. Pepys, and followed at a respectful distance by Leonard, the King then passed through the ante-room, and, descending the grand staircase, traversed a variety of passages, until he reached the private stairs communicating with the river. At their feet lay the royal barge, in which he embarked with his train. Charles appeared greatly moved by the sight of the thousands of his houseless subjects, whom he encountered in his passage down the Thames, and whenever a feeble shout was raised for him, he returned it with blessings. When nearly opposite Queenhithe, he commanded the rowers to pause, and gazed with wonder and deep affliction at the terrible scene before him. The conflagration had made formidable progress since Leonard beheld it a few hours back, and had advanced nearly as far as the Still-yard on the river side, while it was burning upwards through thick ranks of houses, almost as far as Cannon-street. The roaring of the flames was louder than ever—and the crash of falling habitations, and the tumult and cries of the affrighted populace, yet more terrific. Charles gazed on like one who could not believe his senses, and it was some time before the overwhelming truth could force itself upon him. Tears then started to his eyes, and uttering an ejaculation of despair, he commanded the rowers to make instantly for land.

CHAPTER LIV.

HOW LEONARD SAVED THE KING.

THE royal barge landed at Queenhithe, and Charles, instantly disembarking, proceeded on foot, and at a pace that compelled his attendants to move quickly to keep up with him, to Thames street. Here, however, the confusion was so great, owing to the rush of people, and the number of vehicles employed in the removal of goods, that he was obliged to come to a halt. Fortunately, at this moment, a company of the train-bands rode up, and their leader, dismounting, offered his horse to the King, who instantly sprang into the saddle, and, scarcely waiting till the Duke of York could be similarly accommodated, forced his way through the crowd as far as Brewer-lane, where his progress was stopped by the intense heat. At little more than a hundred yards from this point the whole street was on fire, and the flames bursting from the windows and roofs of the houses, with a roar like that which might be supposed to be produced by the forges of the Cyclops, united in a vast blazing arch overhead. It chanced, too, that in some places cellars, filled with combustible materials, extended under the street, and here the ground would crack, and jets of fire shoot forth like the eruption of a volcano. The walls and timbers of the houses at some distance from the conflagration were scorched and blistered with the heat, and completely prepared for ignition. Overhead hung a vast and momentarily-increasing cloud of flame-coloured smoke, which spread all over the city, filling it as with a thick mist, while the glowing vault above looked, as Evelyn expresses it, "Like the top of a burning oven."

Two churches—namely, Allhallows the Great, and Allhallows the Less—were burnt down in the King's sight; and the lofty spire of a third, Saint Lawrence Pountney, had just caught fire, and looked like a flame-tipped spear. After contemplating this spectacle for some time, Charles roused himself from the state of stupefaction into which he was thrown, and, determined, if possible, to arrest the further progress of the devouring element along the river side, commanded all the houses on the west of Dowgate-dock to be instantly demolished. A large body of men were, therefore, set upon this difficult and dangerous, and, as it proved, futile task. Another party were ordered to the same duty on Dowgate-hill, and the crash of tumbling walls and beams was soon added to the general uproar, while clouds of dust darkened the air. It was with some difficulty that a sufficient space could be kept clear for carrying these operations into effect; and long before they were half completed, Charles had the mortification of finding the fire gaining ground so rapidly that they must prove ineffectual. Word was brought at this juncture that a fresh fire had broken out in Elbow-lane, and while the Monarch was listening to this dreary intelligence, a fearful cry was heard near the river, followed, the next moment, by a tumultuous rush of persons from that quarter. The fire, as if in scorn, had leapt across Dowgate-dock, and seizing upon the half-demolished houses, instantly made them its prey. The rapidity with which the conflagration proceeded was astounding, and completely baffled all attempts to check it. The wind continued blowing as furiously as ever, nor was there the slightest prospect of its abatement. All the King's better qualities were called into play by the present terrible crisis. With a courage and devotion that he seldom displayed, he exposed himself to the greatest risk, personally assisting at all the operations he commanded; while his humane attention to the sufferers by the calamity almost reconciled them to their deplorable situation. His movements were almost as rapid as those of the fire itself. Riding up Cannon-street, and from thence by Sweeting's-lane to Lombard-street, and so on, by Fenchurch-street, to Tower-street, he issued directions all the way, checking every disturbance, and causing a band of depredators, who had broken into the house of a wealthy goldsmith, to be carried off to Newgate. Arrived in Tower-street, he found the Earl of Craven and his party stationed a little beyond Saint Dunstan's in the East.

All immediate apprehensions in this quarter appeared at an end. The church had been destroyed, as before mentioned, but several houses in its vicinity having been demolished, the fire had not extended eastward. Satisfied that the Tower was in no immediate danger, the King retraced his course, and encountering the Lord Mayor in Lombard-street, sharply reproved him for his want of zeal and discretion.

"I do not deserve your Majesty's reproaches," replied the Lord Mayor. "Ever since the fire broke out I have not rested an instant, and am almost worn to death with anxiety and fatigue. I am just returned from Guildhall, where a vast quantity of plate belonging to the city companies has been deposited. Lord ! lord ! what a fire this is !”

“ You are chiefly to blame for its getting so much ahead,” replied the King, angrily. “ Had you adopted vigorous measures at the outset, it might have easily been got under. I hear no water was to be obtained. How was that ?”

“ It is a damnable plot, your Majesty, designed by the Papists, or the Dutch, or the French,—I don't know which—perhaps all three,” rejoined the Lord Mayor ; “ as it appears that the cocks of all the pipes at the waterworks of Islington were turned, while the pipes and conduits in the city were empty, This is no accidental fire, your Majesty.”

“ So I find,” replied the King ; “ but it will be time enough to inquire into its origin hereafter. Meantime we must act, and energetically, or we shall be equally as much to blame as the incendiaries. Let a proclamation be made enjoining all those persons who have been driven from their homes by the fire to proceed with such effects as they have preserved to Moorfields, where their wants shall be cared for.”

“ It shall be made instantly, your Majesty,” replied the Lord Mayor.

“ Your next business will be to see to the removal of all the wealth from the goldsmiths' houses in this street, and in Gracechurch-street, to some places of security,—Guildhall, or the Royal Exchange, for instance,” continued the King.

“ Your Majesty's directions shall be implicitly obeyed,” replied the Lord Mayor.

“ You will then pull down all the houses to the east of the fire,” pursued the King. “ Get all the men you can muster—and never relax your exertions till you have made a wide and clear breach between the flames and their prey.”

“ I will—I will, your Majesty,” groaned the Lord Mayor.

“ About it, then,” rejoined the King. And striking spurs into his horse, he rode off with his train.

He now penetrated one of the narrow alleys leading to the Three Cranes in the Vintry, where he ascended to the roof of the habitation that he might view the fire. He saw that it was making such rapid advances towards him that it must very soon reach the building on which he stood, and, half suffocated with the smoke and half-scorched with the fire-drops, he descended.

Not long after this, Waterman's-hall was discovered to be on fire, and stirred by the sight, Charles made fresh efforts to check the progress of the conflagration by demolishing more houses. So eagerly did he occupy himself in the task, that his life had well-nigh fallen a sacrifice to his zeal. He was standing below a building which the workmen were unroofing, when all at once the whole of the upper part of the wall gave way, dragging several heavy beams with it, and would have infallibly crushed him, if Leonard, who was stationed behind him, had not noticed the circumstance, and rushing forward with the greatest promptitude, dragged him out of harm's way. An engineer, with whom the King was conversing at the time of the accident, was buried in the ruins, and when taken out was found fearfully mutilated, and quite dead. Both Charles and his preserver were covered with dust and rubbish, and Leonard received a severe blow on the shoulder from a falling brick.

On recovering from the shock, which for some moments deprived him of the power of speech, Charles inquired for his deliverer, and on being shown him, said, with a look of surprise and pleasure, “ What, is it you, young man ? I am glad of it. Depend upon it, I shall not forget the important service you have rendered me.”

“ If he remembers it, it will be the first time he has ever so exercised his memory,” observed Chiffinch, in a loud whisper, to Leonard. “ I advise you, as a friend, not to let his gratitude cool.”

Undeterred by his late narrow escape, Charles ordered fresh houses to be demolished, and stimulated the workmen to exertion by his personal superintendence of their operations. He commanded Leonard to keep constantly near him, laughingly observing, “ I shall feel safe while you are by. You have a better eye for a falling house than any of my attendants.”

Worn out, at length, with fatigue, Charles proceeded, with the Duke of York and his immediate attendants, to Painters' Hall, in Little Trinity-lane, in quest of refreshment, where a repast was hastily prepared for him, and he sat down to it with an appetite such as the most magnificent banquet could not, under other circumstances, have provoked. His hunger satisfied, he despatched messengers to command the immediate attendance of the Lord Mayor, the sheriffs, and aldermen, and when they arrived, he thus addressed them,—“ My Lord Mayor and Gentlemen, it has been recommended to me by this young man,” pointing to Leonard, “ that the sole way of checking the further progress of this disastrous conflagration, which threatens the total destruction of our city, will be by blowing up the houses with gunpowder, so as to form a wide gap between the flames and the habitations yet remaining unseized. This plan will necessarily involve great destruction of property, and may, notwithstanding all the care that can be adopted, be attended with some loss of life, but I conceive it will be effectual. Before ordering it, however, to be put into execution, I desire to learn your opinion of it. How say you, my Lord Mayor, and Gentlemen ;—does the plan meet with your approbation ?”

“ I pray your Majesty to allow me to confer for a moment with my brethren,” replied the Lord Mayor, cautiously, “ before I return an answer. It is too serious a matter to decide upon at once.”

“ Be it so,” replied the King.

And the civic authorities withdrew from the King. Leonard heard, though he did not dare to remark upon it, that the Duke of York leaned forward as the Lord Mayor passed him, and whispered in his ear, "Take heed what you do. He only desires to shift the responsibility of the act from his own shoulders to yours."

"If they assent," said the King to Leonard, "I will place you at the head of a party of engineers."

"I beseech your Majesty neither to regard me or them," replied Leonard. "Use the authority it has pleased Heaven to bestow upon you for the preservation of the city, and think and act for yourself, or you will assuredly regret your want of decision. It has been my fortune, with the assistance of God, to be the humble instrument of accomplishing your Majesty's deliverance from peril, and I have your royal word that you will not forget it."

"Nor will I," cried the King, hastily.

"Then suffer the petition I now make to you to prevail," cried Leonard, falling on his knees. "Be not influenced by the opinion of the Lord Mayor and his brethren, whose own interests may lead them to oppose the plan, but if you think well of it instantly adopt it."

Charles looked irresolute, but might have yielded if the Duke of York had not stepped forward.

"Your Majesty had better not act too precipitately," said the Duke. "Listen to the counsels of your prudent advisers. A false step in such a case will be irretrievable."

"Nay, brother," rejoined the King, "I see no particular risk in it after all, and I incline towards the young man's opinion."

"At least hear what they have got to say," rejoined the Duke. "And here they come. They have not been long in deliberation."

"The result of it may be easily predicted," said Leonard, rising.

As Leonard had foreseen, the civic authorities were adverse to the plan. The Lord Mayor, in the name of himself and his brethren, earnestly solicited the King to postpone the execution of his order till all other means of checking the progress of the conflagration had been tried, and till such time, at least, as the property of the houses to be destroyed could be removed. He further added that it was the unanimous opinion of himself and his brethren that the plan was fraught with great peril to the safety of the citizens, and that they could not bring themselves to assent to it. If, therefore, his Majesty chose to adopt it, they must leave the responsibility with him.

"I told your Majesty how it would be," observed the Duke of York, triumphantly.

"I am sorry to find you are right, brother," replied the King, frowning. "We are overruled you see, friend," he added to Leonard.

"Your Majesty has signed the doom of your city," rejoined Leonard, mournfully.

"I trust not—I trust not," replied Charles, hastily, and with an uneasy shrug of the shoulder. "Fail not to remind me when all is over of the obligation I am under to you."

"Your Majesty has refused the sole boon I desired to have granted," rejoined Leonard.

"And do you not see the reason, friend?" returned the King. "These worthy and wealthy citizens desire to remove their property. Their arguments are unanswerable. I must give them time to do it. But we waste time here," he added, rising. "Remember," to Leonard, "my debt is not discharged. And I command you, on pain of my sovereign displeasure, not to omit to claim its payment."

"I will enter it in my memorandum-book, and will put your Majesty in mind of it at the fitting season," observed Chiffinch, who had taken a great fancy to Leonard.

The King smiled good-humouredly, and quitting the hall with his attendants, proceeded to superintend the further demolition of houses. He next visited all the posts, saw that the different noblemen were at their appointed stations, and by his unremitting exertions contrived to restore something like order to the tumultuous streets. Thousands of men were now employed in different quarters in pulling down houses, and the most powerful engines of war were employed in the work. The confusion that attended these proceedings is indescribable. The engineers and workmen wrought in clouds of dust and smoke, and the crash of falling timber and walls was deafening. In a short time the upper part of Cornhill was rendered wholly impassable, owing to the heaps of rubbish, and directions were given to the engineers to proceed to the Poultry, and demolish the houses as far as the Conduit in Cheapside, by which means it was hoped that the Royal Exchange would be saved.

Meanwhile, all the wealthy goldsmiths and merchants in Lombard-street and Gracechurch-street had been actively employed in removing all their money, plate, and goods to places of security. A vast quantity was conveyed to Guildhall, as has been stated, and the rest to different churches and halls remote from the scene of conflagration. But, in spite of all their caution, much property was carried off by the depredators, and, amongst others, by Chowles and Judith, who contrived to secure a mass of plate, gold, and jewels, that satisfied even their rapacious souls.

While this was passing in the heart of the burning city, vast crowds were streaming out of its gates, and encamping themselves, in pursuance of the royal injunction, in Finsbury-fields, and Spitalfields. Others crossed the water to Southwark, and took refuge in Saint George's-fields; and it was a sad and touching sight to see all these families collected, without shelter or food, most of whom a few hours before were in possession of all the comforts of life, but were now reduced to the condition of beggars.

To return to the conflagration. While one party continued to labour incessantly at the work of demolition, and effectually sought to quench the flames by bringing a few engines to play upon them—a scanty supply of water having how been obtained,—the fire, disdainful of such puny opposition, and determined to show its giant strength, leaped over all the breaches, drove the water-carriers back, compelled them to relinquish their buckets and to abandon their engines, which it made its prey, and seizing upon the heaps of timber, and other fragments occasioned by the demolition, consumed them, and marched onwards with furious exultation.

It was proceeding up Gracechurch-street, Saint Clement's-lane, Nicholas-lane, and Abchurch-lane, at the same time, destroying all in its course. The whole of Lombard-street was choked up with the ruins and rubbish of demolished houses, through which thousands of persons were toiling to carry off goods, either for the purposes of assistance or of plunder. The King was at the west end of the street, near the church of Saint Mary Woolnoth, and the fearful havoc and destruction going forward drew tears from his eyes. A scene of greater confusion cannot be imagined. Leonard was in the midst of it, and, careless of his own safety, toiled amid the tumbling fragments of the houses to rescue some article of value for its unfortunate owner. While he was thus employed, he observed a man leap out of a window of a partly-demolished house, disclosing in the action that he had a casket concealed under his cloak.

A second glance showed him that this individual was Pillichody, and satisfied that he had been plundering the house, he instantly seized him. The bulky struggled violently, but at last, dropping the casket, made his escape, vowing to be revenged. Leonard laughed at his threats, and the next moment had the satisfaction of restoring the casket to its rightful owner, an old merchant who issued from the house, and who warmly thanking him, told him it contained jewels of immense value.

Not half an hour after this, the flames poured upon Lombard-street from the four avenues before-mentioned, and the whole neighbourhood was on fire. With inconceivable rapidity, they then ran up Birchin-lane, and reaching Cornhill, spread to the right and left in that great thoroughfare. The conflagration had now reached the highest point of the city, and presented the grandest and most terrific aspect it had yet assumed from the river. Thus viewed, it appeared, as Pepys describes it, “as an entire arch of fire, from the Three Cranes to the other side of the bridge, and in a bow up the hill, for an arch of above a mile long; it made me weep to see it.” Vincent also likens its appearance at this juncture to that of a bow. “A dreadful bow it was,” writes this eloquent non-conformist preacher, “such as mine eyes had never before seen; a bow which had God's arrow in it with a flaming point; a shining bow, not like that in the cloud which brings water with it, and which signifieth God's covenant not to destroy the world any more with water, but a bow having a fire in it, and signifying God's anger, and his intention to destroy London with fire.”

As the day drew to a close, and it became darker, the spectacle increased in terror and sublimity. The tall black towers of the churches assumed ghastly forms, and to some eyes appeared like infernal spirits plunging in a lake of flame, while even to the most reckless the conflagration seemed to present a picture of the terrors of the Last Day.

Never before had such a night as that which ensued fallen upon London. None of its inhabitants thought of retiring to rest, or if they sought repose after the excessive fatigue they had undergone, it was only in such manner as would best enable them to rise and renew their exertions to check the flames, which were continued throughout the night, but wholly without success. The conflagration appeared to proceed at the same appalling rapidity, and halls, towers, churches, public and private buildings, were burning to the number of more than ten thousand, while the clouds of smoke covered a vast expanse of more than fifty miles. Travellers approaching London from the north-east were enveloped in it ten miles off, and the fiery reflection in the sky could be discerned at an equal distance. The “hideous storm,” as Evelyn terms the fearful and astounding noise produced by the roaring of the flames and the falling of the numerous fabrics, continued without intermission during the whole of this fatal night.

CHAPTER LV.

HOW THE GROCER'S HOUSE WAS BURNED.

IT was full ten o'clock before Leonard could obtain permission to quit the King's party, and he immediately hurried to Wood-street. He had scarcely entered it when the cry of "fire" smote his ears, and rushing forward in an agony of apprehension, he beheld Mr. Bloundel's dwelling in flames. A large crowd was collected before the burning habitation, keeping guard over a vast heap of goods and furniture that had been removed from it.

So much beloved was Mr. Bloundel, and in such high estimation was his character held, that all his neighbours, on learning that his house was on fire, flew to his assistance, and bestirred themselves so actively, that in an extraordinary short space of time they had emptied the house of every article of value, and placed it out of danger in the street. In vain the grocer urged them to desist; his entreaties were disregarded by his zealous friends, and when he told them they were profaning the Sabbath, they replied that the responsibility of their conduct would rest entirely on themselves, and they hoped they might never have any thing worse to answer for. In spite of his disapproval of what was done, the grocer could not but be sensibly touched by their devotion, and as to his wife, she said with tears in her eyes, that "it was almost worth while having a fire to prove what good friends they had."

It was at this juncture that Leonard arrived. Way was instantly made for him, and leaping over the piles of chests and goods that blocked up the thoroughfare, he flew to Mr. Bloundel, who was standing in front of his flaming habitation with as calm and unmoved an expression of countenance as if nothing was happening, and presently ascertained from him in what manner the fire had originated.

It appeared that while the whole of the family were assembled at prayers, in the room ordinarily used for that purpose, they were alarmed at supper by a strong smell of smoke, which seemed to arise from the lower part of the house, and that as soon as their devotions were ended, for Mr. Bloundel would not allow them to stir before, Stephen and Blaize had proceeded to ascertain the cause, and on going down to the kitchen, found a dense smoke issuing from the adjoining cellar, the door of which stood ajar. Hearing a noise in the yard, they darted up the back steps, communicating with the cellar, and discovered a man trying to make his escape over the wall by a rope ladder. Stephen instantly seized him, and the man drawing a sword, tried to free himself from his captor. In the struggle he dropt a pistol, which Blaize snatching up, discharged with fatal effect against the wretch, who, on examination, proved to be Pillichody.

Efforts were made to check the fire, but in vain. The villain had accomplished his diabolical purpose too well. Acquainted with the premises, and with the habits of the family, he had got into the yard by means of the rope ladder, and hiding himself till the servants were summoned to prayers, stole into the cellar, and placing a fire-ball amid a heap of fagots and coals, and near several large casks of oil and other inflammable matters, struck a light and set fire to it.

"I shall ever reproach myself that I was away when this calamity occurred," observed Leonard, as the grocer brought his relation to an end.

"Then you will do so without reason," replied Mr. Bloundel, "for you could have rendered no assistance, and you see my good neighbours have taken the matter entirely out of my hands."

"Whither do you intend removing, sir?" rejoined Leonard. "If I might suggest, I would advise you to go to Farmer Wingfield's, at Kensal Green."

"You have anticipated my intention," replied the grocer: "but we must now obtain some vehicles to transport these goods thither."

"Be that my part," replied Leonard. And in a short space of time he had procured half a dozen large carts, into which the whole of the goods were speedily packed; and a coach having been likewise fetched by Blaize. Mrs. Bloundel and the three younger children, together with old Josyna and Patience, were placed in it.

"I hope your mother has taken care of her money," whispered the latter to the porter, as he assisted her into the vehicle.

"Never mind whether she has or not," rejoined Blaize, in the same tone; "we shan't want it. I am now as rich as my master,—perhaps richer. On stripping that rascal, Pillichody, I found a large bag of gold, besides several caskets of jewels, upon him, all of which I consider lawful spoil, as he fell by my hand."

"To be sure," rejoined Patience. "I dare say he did not come very honestly by the treasures, but you can't help that, you know."

Blaize made no reply, but pushing her into the coach, shut the door.

All being now in readiness, directions were given to the drivers of the carts whither to proceed, and they were put in motion. At this moment the grocer's firmness deserted him. Gazing at the old habitation, which was now wrapped in a sheet of flame, he cried, in a voice broken with emotion,—“In that house I have dwelt nearly thirty years—in that house all my children were born—in that house I found a safe refuge from the devouring pestilence. It is hard to quit it thus.”

Controlling his emotion, however, the next moment, he turned away. But his feelings were destined to another trial. His neighbours flocked round him to bid him farewell in tones of such sympathy and regard that his constancy again deserted him.

“Thank you, thank you,” he cried, pressing in turn each hand that was offered him. “Your kindness will never be effaced from my memory. God bless you all and may He watch over you and protect you!” And with these words, he broke from them.

So great was the crowd and confusion in Cheapside that nearly two hours elapsed before they reached Newgate; and indeed, if it had not been for the interference of the Earl of Rochester, they would not, in all probability, have got out of the city at all. The Earl was stationed near the Old Change, at the entrance to Saint Paul's churchyard, and learning their distress, ordered a party of the guard by whom he was attended to force a passage for them. Both Mr. Bloundel and Leonard would have declined this assistance if they had had the power of doing so, but there was no help in the present case.

They encountered no further difficulties, but were necessarily compelled to proceed at a slow pace, and did not reach Paddington for nearly two hours, being frequently stopped by persons, eagerly asking as to the progress of the fire. One circumstance struck the whole party as remarkable. Such was the tremendous glare of the conflagration that even at this distance the fire seemed close beside them, and if they had not known the contrary, they would have thought it could not be further off than Saint Giles's. The whole eastern sky in that direction seemed on fire, and glowed through the clouds of yellow smoke with which the air was filled with fearful splendour. After halting a short time at the Wheatsheaf, which they found open,—for, indeed, no house was closed that night,—to obtain some refreshment, and allay the intolerable thirst by which they were tormented, the party pursued their journey along the Harrow road, and in due time approached Wingfield's residence.

The honest farmer, who, with his wife and two of his men, was standing in a field at the top of the hill, gazing at the conflagration, hearing the noise occasioned by the carts, ran to the road side to see what was coming, and encountered Mr. Bloundel and Leonard, who had walked up the ascent a little more quickly than the others.

“I have been thinking of you,” he said, after a cordial greeting had passed between them, “and wondering what would become of you in this dreadful fire. Nay, I had just told my dame I should go and look after you, and see whether I could be of any service to you. Well, I should be better pleased to see you in any way but this, though you could not be welcomer. I have room in the barn and outhouses for all you have brought, and hope and trust you have not lost much.”

“I have lost nothing except the old house,” replied the grocer, heaving a sigh.

The coach having by this time arrived, Wingfield hastened towards it, and assisted its occupants to alight. Mrs. Bloundel was warmly welcomed by Dame Wingfield, and being taken with her children to the house, was truly happy to find herself under the shelter of its hospitable roof. The rest of the party, assisted by Wingfield and his men, exerting themselves to the utmost, the carts were speedily unloaded, and the goods deposited in the barns and outhouses. This done, the drivers were liberally rewarded for their trouble by Mr. Bloundel, and after draining several large jugs of ale brought them by the farmer, made the best of their way back, certain of obtaining further employment during the night.

Fatigued as he was, Leonard, before retiring to rest could not help lingering on the brow of the hill to gaze at the burning city. The same effect was observable here as at Paddington, and the conflagration appeared little more than a mile off. The whole heavens seemed on fire, and a distant roar was heard, like the rush of a high wind through a mighty forest. Westminster Abbey and Saint Paul's could distinctly be seen in black relief against the sheet of flame, together with innumerable towers, spires, and other buildings, the whole constituting a picture unsurpassed for terrific grandeur since the world began, and only to be equalled by its final destruction.

Having gazed at the conflagration for some time, and fancied that he could even at this distance discern the fearful progress it made, Leonard retired to the barn, and throwing himself upon a heap of straw, instantly fell asleep. He was awakened the next morning by Farmer Wingfield, who came to tell him breakfast was ready, and having performed his ablutions, they adjourned to the house. Finding Mr. Bloundel comfortably established in his new quarters, Leonard proposed, as soon as breakfast was over, to proceed to town, and Wingfield volunteered to accompany him. Blaize, also, having placed his treasures, except a few pieces of gold, in the custody of Patience, begged to make one of the party, and his request being acceded to, the trio set out on foot, and gleaning fresh partiulars of the fearful progress of the fire as they advanced, passed along Oxford-road, and crossing Holborn-bridge, on the western side of which they were now demolishing the houses, mounted Snow-hill, and passed through the portal of Newgate.

Here they learnt that the whole of Wood-street was consumed, that the fire had spread eastward as far as Gutter-lane, and that Saint Michael's Church, adjoining Wood-street, Goldsmith's Hall, and the church of Saint John Zachary, were in flames. They were also told that the greater part of Cheapside was on fire, and wholly impassable—while the destructive element was invading at one and the same time Guildhall and the Royal Exchange. They furthermore learnt that the conflagration had spread fearfully along the side of the river, had passed Queenhithe, consuming all the wharfs and warehouses in its way, and having just destroyed Paul's Wharf, was at that time assailing Baynard's Castle. This intelligence determined them not to attempt to proceed further into the city, which they saw was wholly impracticable; and they accordingly turned down Ivy-lane, and approached the cathedral with the intention, if possible, of ascending the central tower. They found a swarm of booksellers' porters and assistants at the northern entrance, engaged in transporting immense bales of books and paper to the vaults in Saint Faith's, where it was supposed the stock would be in safety, permission to that effect having been obtained from the Dean and Chapter.

Forcing their way through this crowd, Leonard and his companions crossed the transept, and proceeded towards the door of the spiral staircase leading to the central tower. It was open, and they passed through it. On reaching the summit of the tower, which they found occupied by some dozen or twenty persons, a spectacle that far exceeded the utmost stretch of their imaginations burst upon them. Through clouds of tawny smoke scarcely distinguishable from flame, so thickly were they charged with sparks and fire-flakes, they beheld a line of fire spreading along Cheapside and Cornhill, as far as the Royal Exchange, which was now in flames, and branching upwards in another line through Lawrence-lane to Guildhall, which was likewise burning. Nearer to them on the north, the fire kindled by the wretched Pillichody, who only, perhaps, anticipated the work of destruction by a few hours, had, as they had heard, proceeded to Goldsmith's Hall, and was rapidly advancing down Saint Anne's-lane to Aldersgate. But it was on the right, and to the south-east, that the conflagration assumed its most terrific aspect. There, from Bow Church to the river side, beyond the bridge as far as Billingsgate, and from thence up Mincing-lane, crossing Fenchurch-street and Lime-street to Gracechurch-street and Cornhill, describing a space of more than two miles in length and one in depth, every habitation was on fire. The appearance of this bed of flame was like an ocean of fire agitated by a tempest, in which a number of barks were struggling, some of them being each moment engulfed. The stunning and unearthly roar of the flames aided this appearance, which was further heightened by the enormous billows of flame that ever and anon rolled tumultuously onward as they were caught by some gust of wind of more than usual violence. The spires of the churches looked like the spars of "tall ammirals" that had foundered, while the blackening ruins of the halls and larger buildings well represented the ribs and beams of mighty hulks.

Leaving Leonard and his companions to the contemplation of this tremendous spectacle, we shall proceed to take a nearer view of its ravages.

Every effort had been used to preserve the Royal Exchange by the city authorities, and by the engineers, headed by the King in person. All the buildings in its vicinity were demolished. But in vain. The irresistible and unrelenting foe drove the defenders back as before—seized upon their barricades, and used them, like a skilful besieger, against the fortress they sought to protect. Solomon Eagle, who was mounted upon a heap of ruins, witnessed this scene of destruction, and uttered a laugh of exultation as the flames seized upon their prey.

"I told you," he cried, "that the extortioners and usurers who resorted to that building, and made gold their God, would be driven forth, and their temple destroyed. And my words have come to pass. It burns—it burns—and so shall they, if they turn not from their ways."

Hearing this wild speech, and beholding the extraordinary figure of the enthusiast, whose scorched locks and smoke-begrimed limbs gave him almost the appearance of an infernal spirit, the King inquired with some trepidation from his attendants who or what he was, and being informed, ordered them to seize him. But the enthusiast set their attempts at naught. Springing with wonderful agility from fragment to fragment of the ruins, and continuing his vociferations, he at last plunged through the flame into the Exchange itself, rendering further pursuit, of course, impossible, unless those who desired to capture him, were determined to share his fate, which now seemed inevitable. To the astonishment of all, however, he appeared a few minutes afterwards on the roof of the blazing pile, and continued his denunciations till driven away by the flames. He seemed, indeed, to bear a charmed life, for it was rumoured—though the report was scarcely credited—that he had escaped from the burning building, and made good his retreat to Saint Paul's. Soon after this the Exchange was one mass of flame. Having gained an entrance to the galleries, the fire ran round them with inconceivable swiftness, as was the case in the conflagration of this later structure, and filling every chamber, gushed out of the windows, and poured down upon the courts and walks below. Fearful and prodigious was the ruin that ensued. The stone walls cracked with the intense heat, tottered and fell—the pillars shivered and broke asunder—the statues dropped from their niches, and were destroyed, one only surviving the wreck—that of the illustrious founder, Sir Thomas Gresham.

Deploring the fate of the Royal Exchange, the King and his attendants proceeded to Guildhall. But here they were too late, nor could they even rescue a tithe of the plate and valuables lodged within it for security. The effects of the fire as displayed in this structure were singularly grand and surprising. The greater part of the ancient fabric being composed of oak of the hardest kind, it emitted little flame, but became after a time red hot, and remained in this glowing state till night, when it resembled, as an eye-witness describes it, “a mighty palace of gold, or a great building of burnished brass.”

The greatest fury of the conflagration was displayed at the Poultry, where five distinct fires met, and united their forces,—one which came roaring down Cornhill from the Royal Exchange,—a second down Threadneedle-street—a third up Walbrook—a fourth along Bucklersbury—and the fifth, that marched against the wind up Cheapside; all these uniting, as at a focus, a whirl of flame, an intensity of heat, and a thundering roar were produced, such as were nowhere else experienced.

To return to the party on the central tower of the cathedral. Stunned and half stifled by the roar and smoke, Leonard and his companions descended from their lofty post, and returned to the body of the fane. They were about to issue forth, when Leonard, glancing down the northern aisle, perceived the Earl of Rochester and Lord Argentine standing together at the lower end of it. Their gestures showed that it was not an amicable meeting, and mindful of what had passed at Whitehall, Leonard resolved to abide the result. Presently, he saw Lord Argentine turn sharply round, and strike his companion in the face with his glove. The clash of swords instantly succeeded, and Leonard and Wingfield started forward to separate the combatants. Blaize followed, but more cautiously, contenting himself with screaming at the top of his voice, “Murder! murder! sacrilege! a duel! a duel!”

Wingfield was the first to arrive at the scene of strife, but just as he reached the combatants, who were too much blinded by passion to notice his approach, Lord Argentine struck his adversary's weapon from his grasp, and would have followed up the advantage if the former had not withheld his arm. Enraged at the interference, Argentine turned his fury against the new comer, and strove to use his sword against him,—but in the terrible struggle that ensued, and at the close of which they fell together, the weapon, as if directed by the hand of an avenging fate, passed through his own breast, inflicting a mortal wound.

“Susan Wingfield is revenged,” said the farmer, as he arose, drenched in the blood of his opponent.

“Susan Wingfield!” exclaimed the wounded man, —“what was she to you?”

“Much,” replied the farmer. “She was my daughter.”

“Ah!” exclaimed Argentine, with an expression of unutterable anguish. “Let me have your forgiveness,” he groaned.

“You have it,” replied Wingfield, kneeling beside him, “and may God pardon us both—you for the wrong you did my daughter, me for being accidentally the cause of your death. But I trust you are not mortally hurt?”

“I have not many minutes to live,” replied Argentine. “But is not that Leonard Holt?”

“It is,” said Rochester, stepping forward.

“I can, then, do one rightful act before I die,” he said, raising himself on one hand, and holding the other forcibly to his side, so as to staunch in some degree the effusion of blood. “Leonard Holt,” he continued, “my sister Isabella loves you—deeply, devotedly. I have tried to conquer the passion, but in vain. You have my consent to wed her.”

“I am a witness to your words, my lord,” said Rochester, “and I call upon all present to be so likewise.”

“Rochester, you were once my friend,” groaned Argentine, “and may yet be a friend to the dead. Remember the King sells titles. Teach this young man how to purchase one. My sister must not wed one of his degree.”

“Make yourself easy on that score,” replied Rochester; “he has already sufficient claim upon the King. He saved his life yesterday.”

“He will trust to a broken reed if he trusts to Charles's gratitude,” replied Argentine. “Buy the title—buy it, I say. My sister left me yesterday. I visited my anger on her, and she fled. I believe she took refuge with Doctor Hodges, but I am sure he can tell you where she is. One thing more,” continued the dying man, fixing his glazing eyes on Leonard. “Go to Newgate—to—to a prisoner there—an incendiary—and obtain a document from him. Tell him with my dying breath I charged you to do this. It will enable you to act as I have directed. Promise me you will go. Promise me you will fulfil my injunctions.”

“I do,” replied Leonard.

“Enough,” rejoined Argentine. “May you be happy with Isabella.” And removing his hand from his side, a copious effusion of blood followed, and sinking backwards, he expired.

CHAPTER LVI.

THE BURNING OF OLD SAINT PAUL'S.

SEVERAL other persons having by this time come up, the body of Lord Argentine was conveyed to Bishop Kempe's chapel, and left there till a fitting season should arrive for its removal. Confounded by the tragical event that had taken place, Leonard remained with his eyes fixed upon the blood-stained pavement until he was roused by an arm which gently drew him away, while the voice of the Earl of Rochester breathed in his ear, "This is a sad occurrence, Leonard, and yet it is most fortunate for you, for it removes the only obstacle to your union with the Lady Isabella. You see how fleeting life is, and how easily we may be deprived of it. I tried to reason Lord Argentine into calmness, but nothing would satisfy him except my blood, and there he lies, though not by my hand. Let his fate be a lesson to us, and teach us to live in charity with each other. I have wronged you—deeply wronged you—but I will make all the atonement in my power, and let me think I am forgiven."

The blood rushed tumultuously to Leonard's heart, as he listened to what the Earl said, but overcoming his feelings of aversion by a powerful effort, he took the proffered hand.

"I do forgive you, my lord," he said.

"These words have removed a heavy weight from my soul," replied Rochester, "and if Death should trip up my heels as suddenly as he did his who perished on this spot, I shall be better prepared to meet him. And now let me advise you to repair to Newgate without delay, and see the wretched man, and obtain the document from him. The fire will reach the gaol ere long, and the prisoners must of necessity be removed. Amid the confusion his escape might be easily accomplished."

"Recollect, my lord, that the direful conflagration now prevailing without is owing to him," replied Leonard. "I will never be accessory to his escape."

"And yet his death by the public executioner"—urged Rochester. "Think of its effect on his daughter."

"Justice must take its course," rejoined Leonard. "I would not aid him to escape if he were my own father."

"In that case, nothing more is to be said," replied Rochester. "But at all events see him as quickly as you can. I would accompany you, but my duty detains me here. When you return from your errand you will find me at my post near the entrance of the church-yard in front of Saint Michael's le Quern,—that is, if I am not beaten from it. Having seen the father, your next business must be to seek out the daughter, and remove her from this dangerous neighbourhood. You have heard where she is to be found."

Upon this, they separated.—Leonard and his two companions quitting the cathedral by the great western entrance, and proceeding towards Paul's Alley, and the Earl betaking himself to the north-east corner of the church-yard. The former got as far as Ivy Lane, but found it wholly impassable, in consequence of the goods and furniture with which it was blocked up. They were, therefore, obliged to return to the precincts of the cathedral, where Blaize, who was greatly terrified by what he had seen, expressed his determination of quitting them, and hurried back to the sacred pile. Leonard and the farmer next essayed to get up Ave Maria-lane, but finding it impassable, they made for Ludgate, and after a long delay and severe struggle, got through the portal. The Old Bailey was entirely filled with persons removing their goods, and they were here informed, to their great dismay, that the conflagration had already reached Newgate Market, which was burning with the greatest fury, and was at that moment seizing upon the gaol. No one, however, in answer to Leonard's inquiries, could tell him what had become of the prisoners.

"I suppose they have left them to burn," observed a by-stander who heard the question, with a malicious look; "and it is the best way of getting rid of them."

Paying no attention to the remark, nor to the brutal laugh accompanying it, Leonard, assisted by Wingfield, fought his way through the crowd till he reached the prison. Flames were bursting through its grated windows, and both wings, as well as the massive gate connecting them, were on fire. Regardless of the risk he ran, Leonard forced his way to the lodge door, where two turnkeys were standing removing their goods.

"What has become of the prisoners?" he asked.

"The debtors are set free," replied the turnkey addressed, "and all but one or two of the common felons are removed."

"And where are those poor creatures?" cried Leonard, horror-stricken.

"In the Stone Hold," replied the turnkey.

"And have you left them to perish there?" demanded Leonard.

"We couldn't help it," rejoined the turnkey. "It would have been risking our lives to venture near them. One is a murderer, taken in the fact; and the other is quite as bad, for he set the city on fire, so it's right and fair he should perish by his own contrivance."

"Where does the Stone Hold lie?" cried Leonard, in a tone that startled the turnkey. "I must get these prisoners out."

"You can't, I tell you," rejoined the turnkey, doggedly. "They're burnt to a cinder by this time."

"Give me your keys, and show me the way to the cell," cried Leonard, authoritatively. "I will at least attempt to save them."

"Well, if you're determined to put an end to yourself, you may try," replied the turnkey; "but I've warned you as to what you may expect. This way," he added, opening a door from which a thick volume of smoke issued, "If any of 'em's alive, you'll soon know it by the cries."

And, as if in answer to the remark, a most terrific shriek at that moment burst on their ears.

"Here are the keys," cried the turnkey, delivering them to Leonard. "You're not going, too?" he added, as Wingfield pushed past him. "A couple of madmen! I shouldn't wonder if they were incendiaries."

Directed by the cries, Leonard pressed forward through the blinding and stifling smoke. After proceeding about twenty yards, he arrived at a cross passage, where the smoke was not quite so dense, as it found an escape through a small grated aperture in the wall. And here a horrible sight was presented to him. At the further extremity of this passage was a small cell, from which the cries he had heard issued. Not far from it the stone roof had fallen in, and from the chasm thus caused the flames were pouring into the passage. Regardless of the risk he ran, Leonard dashed forward, and reaching the cell, beheld Grant, still living, but in such a dreadful state that it was evident his sufferings must soon be ended. His hair and beard were singed close to his head and face, and his flesh was blistered, blackened and scorched to the bone. On seeing Leonard, he uttered a hoarse cry, and attempted to speak, but the words rattled in his throat. He then staggered forward, and to Leonard's inexpressible horror, thrust his arms through the bars of the cage, which were literally red-hot. Seeing he had something in one hand, though he could not unclothe his fingers, Leonard took it from him, and the wretched man fell backwards. At this moment a loud crack was heard in the wall behind. Several ponderous stones dropped from their places, admitting a volume of flame that filled the whole cell, and disclosing another body on the floor, near which lay that of Grant. Horrified by the spectacle, Leonard staggered off, and catching Wingfield's arm, sought to retrace his steps. This was no easy matter, the smoke being so dense they could not see a foot before them, and were obliged to feel their way along the wall. On arriving at the cross passage, Wingfield would fain have turned off to the right, but Leonard drew him forcibly in the opposite direction, and most fortunate was it that he did so, or the worthy farmer would inevitably have perished. At last, they reached the lodge, and sank down on a bench from exhaustion.

"So, my masters," observed the turnkey, with a grim smile, "you were not able to rescue them, I perceive?" But receiving no answer, he added, "Well, and what did you see?"

"A sight that would have moved even your stony heart to compassion," returned Leonard, getting up and quitting the lodge. Followed by Wingfield, and scarcely knowing where he was going, he forced his way through the crowd, and dashing down Snow-hill, did not stop till he reached Holborn conduit, where, seizing a leathern bucket, he filled it with water, and plunged his head into it. Refreshed by the immersion, he now glanced at the document committed to him by Grant. It was a piece of parchment, and showed by its shrivelled and scorched appearance the agony which its late possessor must have endured. Leonard did not open it, but thrust it with a shudder into his doublet.

Meditating on the strange and terrible events that had just occurred, Leonard's thoughts involuntarily wandered to the Lady Isabella, whose image appeared to him like a bright star shining on troubled waters, and for the first time venturing to indulge a hope that she might indeed be his, he determined immediately to proceed in search of her.

It was now high noon, but the mid-day sun was scarcely visible, or visible at all; as it struggled through the masses of yellow vapour, it looked red as blood. Bands of workmen were demolishing houses on the western side of Fleet Ditch, and casting the rubbish into the muddy sluice before them, by which means it was confidently but vainly hoped that the progress of the fire would be checked. Shaping their course along the opposite side of the ditch, and crossing to Fleet Bridge, Leonard and his companion passed through Salisbury Court to Whitefriars, and taking a boat, directed the waterman to land them at Puddle-dock. The river was still covered with craft of every description laden with goods, and Baynard's Castle, an embattled stone structure of great strength and solidity, built at the beginning of the fifteenth century, on the site of another castle as old as the Conquest, being now wrapped in flames from foundation to turret, offered a magnificent spectacle. From this point the four ascents leading to the cathedral, namely Addle-hill, St. Bennet's-hill, Saint Peter's-hill, and Lambert-hill, with all their throng of habitations, were burning—the black lines of ruined walls standing in bold relief against the white sheet of flame. Bil-lows of fire rolled upwards every moment towards Saint Paul's, and threatened it with destruction.

Landing at the appointed place, Leonard and his companion ascended Saint Andrew's-hill, and, proceeding along Carter-lane, soon gained the precincts of the cathedral. Here the whole mass of habitations on the summit of Saint Bennet's-hill, extending from the eastern end of Carter-lane to Distaff-lane, was on fire, and the flames were dashed by the fierce wind against the south-east corner of the cathedral. A large crowd was collected at this point, and great efforts were made to save the venerable pile, but Leonard saw that its destruction was inevitable. Forcing a way through the throng with his companion, they reached Doctor Hodges's residence at the corner of Watling-street, and Leonard, without waiting to knock, tried the door, which yielded to his touch. The habitation was empty, and from the various articles scattered about, it was evident its inmates must have fled with the greatest precipitation. Alarmed at this discovery, Leonard rushed forth with Wingfield, and sought to ascertain from the crowd without whither Dr. Hodges was gone, but could learn nothing more than that he had departed with his whole household a few hours before. At last, it occurred to him that he might obtain some information from the Earl of Rochester, and he was about to cross to the other side of the churchyard, when he was arrested by a simultaneous cry of horror from the assemblage. Looking upwards, for there he saw the general gaze directed, he perceived that the scaffolding around the roof and tower of the cathedral had kindled, and was enveloping the whole upper part of the fabric in a net-work of fire. Flames were likewise bursting from the belfry, and from the lofty pointed windows below it, flickering and playing round the hoary buttresses, and disturbing the numerous jackdaws that built in their timeworn crevices, and flew screaming forth. As Leonard gazed at the summit of the tower, he discerned, through the circling eddies of smoke that enveloped it, the figure of Solomon Eagle standing on the top of the battlements, and waving his staff, and almost fancied he could hear his voice. After remaining in this perilous situation for some minutes, as if to raise anxiety for his safety to the highest pitch, the enthusiast sprang upon a portion of the scaffolding that was only partly consumed, and descended from pole to pole, regardless whether burning or not, with marvellous swiftness, and apparently without injury. Alighting on the roof he speeded to the eastern extremity of the fane, and there commenced his exhortations to the crowd below.

It now became evident also, from the strange roaring noise proceeding from the tower, that the flames were descending the spiral staircase, and forcing their way through some secret doors or passages to the roof. Determined to take one last survey of the cathedral before its destruction, which he now saw was inevitable, Leonard motioned to Wingfield, and forcing his way through the crowd, which was now considerably thinned entered the southern door. He had scarcely gained the middle of the transept, when the door opened behind him, and two persons, whom, even in the brief glimpse he caught of them, he knew to be Chowles and Judith, darted towards the steps leading to Saint Faith's. They appeared to be carrying a large chest, but Leonard was too much interested in what was occurring to pay much attention to them. There were but few persons besides himself and his companion within the cathedral, and those few were chiefly booksellers' porters, who were hurrying out of Saint Faith's in the utmost trepidation. By and by, these were gone, and they were alone,—alone within that vast structure, and at such a moment. Their situation, though perilous, was one that awakened thrilling and sublime emotions. The cries of the multitude, coupled with the roaring of the conflagration, resounded from without, while the fierce glare of the flames lighted up the painted windows at the head of the choir with unwonted splendour. Overhead was heard a hollow rumbling noise like that of distant thunder, which continued for a short time while fluid streams of smoke crept through the mighty rafters of the roof, and gradually filled the whole interior of the fabric with vapour. Suddenly a tremendous cracking was heard, as if the whole pile were tumbling in pieces. So appalling was this sound, that Leonard and his companion would have fled, but they were completely transfixed by terror.

While they were in this state, the flames, which had long been burning in secret, burst through the roof at the further end of the choir, and instantaneously spread over its whole expanse. At this juncture, a cry of wild exultation was heard in the great northern gallery, and looking up, Leonard beheld Solomon Eagle, hurrying with lightning swiftness round it, and shouting in tones of exultation, "My words have come to pass—it burns—it burns—and will be utterly consumed!"

The vociferations of the enthusiast were answered by a piercing cry from below, proceeding from Blaize, who at that moment rushed from the entrance of Saint Faith's. On seeing the porter, Leonard shouted to him, and the poor fellow hurried towards him. At this juncture, a strange hissing sound was heard, as if a heavy shower of rain was descending upon the roof, and through the yawning gap over the choir there poured a stream of molten lead of silvery brightness. Nothing can be conceived more beautiful than this shining yet terrible cascade, which descended with momentarily increasing fury, sparkling, flashing, hissing, and consuming all before it. All the elaborately-carved wood-work and stalls upon which it fell were presently in flames. Leonard and his companions now turned to fly, but they had scarcely moved a few paces when another fiery cascade burst through the roof near the great western entrance, for which they were making, flooding the aisles and plashing against the massive columns. At the same moment, too, a third stream began to fall over the northern transept, not far from where Blaize stood, and a few drops of the burning metal reaching him, caused him to utter the most fearful outcries. Seriously alarmed, Leonard and Wingfield now rushed to one of the monuments in the northern aisle, and hastily clambering it, reached a window, which they burst open. Blaize followed them, but not without receiving a few accidental splashes from the fiery torrents, which elicited from him the most astounding yells. Having helped him to climb the monument, Leonard pushed him through the window after Wingfield, and then cast his eye round the building before he himself descended. The sight was magnificent in the extreme. From the flaming roof three silvery cascades descended. The choir was in flames, and a glowing stream like lava was spreading over the floor, and slowly trickling down the steps leading to the body of the church. The transepts and the greater part of the nave were similarly flooded. Above the roar of the flames and the hissing plash of the descending torrents was heard the wild laughter of Solomon Eagle. Perceiving him in one of the arcades of the southern gallery, Leonard shouted to him to descend, and make good his escape while there was yet time, adding that in a few moments it would be too late.

"I shall never quit it more," rejoined the enthusiast, in a voice of thunder, "but shall perish with the fire I have kindled. No monarch on earth ever lighted a nobler funeral pyre."

And as Leonard passed through the window, he disappeared along the gallery. Breaking through the crowd collected round Wingfield and Blaize, and calling to them to follow him, Leonard made his way to the north-east of the churchyard, where he found a large assemblage of persons, in the midst of which were the King, the Duke of York, Rochester, Arlington, and many others. As Leonard advanced, Charles discerned him amid the crowd, and motioned him to come forward. A passage was then cleared for him, through which Wingfield and Blaize, who kept close beside him, were permitted to pass.

"I am glad to find no harm has happened to you, friend," said Charles, as he approached. "Rochester informed me you were gone to Newgate, and as the gaol has been burnt down, I feared you might have met with the same mishap. I now regret that I did not adopt your plan, but it may not be yet too late."

"It is not too late to save a portion of your city, sire," replied Leonard; "but, alas! how much is gone!"

"It is so," replied the King mournfully.

Further conversation was here interrupted by the sudden breaking out of the fire from the magnificent rose window of the cathedral, the effect of which, being extraordinarily fine, attracted the monarch's attention. By this time Solomon Eagle had again ascended the roof, and making his way to the eastern extremity, clasped the great stone cross that terminated it with his left hand, while with his right he menaced the King and his party, uttering denunciations that were lost in the terrible roar prevailing around him. The flames now raged with a fierceness wholly inconceivable, considering the material they had to work upon. The molten lead poured down in torrents, and not merely flooded the whole interior of the fabric, but ran down in a wide and boiling stream almost as far as the Thames consuming everything in its way, and rendering the very pavements red-hot. Every stone spout and gutter in the sacred pile, of which there were some hundreds, added to this fatal shower, and scattered destruction far and wide; nor will this be wondered at when it is considered that the quantity of lead thus melted covered a space of no less than six acres. Having burned with incredible fury and fierceness for some time, the whole roof of the sacred structure fell in at once, with a crash heard at an amazing distance. After an instant's pause, the flames burst forth from every window in the fabric, producing such an intensity of heat that the stone pinnacles, transom beams, and mullions, split and cracked with a sound like volleys of artillery, shivering and flying in every direction. The whole interior of the pile was now one vast sheet of flame, which soared upwards, and consumed even the very stones. Not a vestige of the reverend structure was left untouched,—its bells—its plate—its woodwork—its monuments—its mighty pillars—its galleries—its chapels—all, all were destroyed. The fire raged throughout all that night and the next day, till it had consumed all but the mere shell, and rendered the venerable cathedral, "one of the most ancient pieces of piety in the Christian world," to use the words of Evelyn, a heap of ruins and ashes.

CHAPTER LVII.

HOW LEONARD RESCUED THE LADY ISABELLA.

THE course of events, having been somewhat anticipated in the last chapter, it will now be necessary to return to an earlier stage in the destruction of the cathedral, namely, soon after the furious bursting forth of the flames from the great eastern windows. While Leonard, in common with the rest of the assemblage, was gazing at this magnificent spectacle, he heard a loud cry of distress behind him, and turning at the sound, beheld Doctor Hodges rush forth from an adjoining house, the upper part of which was on fire, almost in a state of distraction. An elderly man and woman, and two or three female servants, all of whom were crying as loudly as himself, followed him. But their screams fell on indifferent ears, for the crowd had become by this time too much accustomed to such appeals to pay any particular attention to them. Leonard however, instantly rushed towards the Doctor and anxiously inquired what was the matter; the latter was so bewildered that he did not recognize the voice of the speaker, but gazing up at the house, with indescribable anguish cried, "Merciful God! the flames have by this time reached her room—she will be burned—horror!"

"Who will be burned!" cried Leonard, seizing his arm, and gazing at him with a look of apprehension and anguish equal to his own—"Not the Lady Isabella?"

"Yes, Isabella," replied Hodges, regarding the speaker, and for the first time perceiving by whom he was addressed. "Not a moment is to be lost if you would save her from a terrible death. She was left in a fainting state in one of the upper rooms by a female attendant, who deserted her mistress to save herself. The staircase is on fire, or I myself would have saved her."

"A ladder! a ladder!" cried Leonard.

"Here is one!" cried Wingfield, pointing to one propped against an adjoining house.

And in another moment, by the combined efforts of the crowd, the ladder was brought and placed against the burning building.

"Which is the window?" cried Leonard.

"That on the right on the second floor," replied Hodges. "Gracious heaven! the flames are bursting from it."

But Leonard's foot was now on the ladder, and rushing up with inconceivable swiftness he plunged through the window regardless of the flame. All those who witnessed this daring deed, regarded his destruction as certain, and even Hodges gave him up for lost. But the next moment he appeared at the window, bearing the fainting female form in his arms, and with extraordinary dexterity obtaining a firm footing and hold of the ladder, descended in safety. The shout that burst from such part of the assemblage as had witnessed this achievement, and its successful termination, attracted the King's attention, and he inquired the cause of the clamour.

"I will ascertain it for your Majesty," replied Rochester, and proceeding to the group, he learnt, to his great satisfaction, what had occurred.

Having gained this intelligence, he flew back to the King, and briefly explained the situation of the parties. Doctor Hodges, it appeared, had just removed to the house in question, which belonged to one of his patients, as a temporary asylum, and the Lady Isabella had accompanied him. She was in the upper part of the house when the fire broke out, and was so much terrified that she swooned away, in which condition her attendant left her; nor was the latter so much to blame as might appear, for the stairs were burning at the time, and a moment's delay would have endangered her own safety.

"Fate, indeed, seems to have brought these young persons together," replied Charles, as he listened to Rochester's recital, who took this opportunity of acquainting him with Lord Argentine's dying injunctions, "and it would be a pity to separate them."

"I am sure your Majesty has no such intention," said Rochester.

"You will see," rejoined the Monarch.

And as he spoke, he turned his horse's head, and moved towards the spot where Leonard was kneeling beside Isabella and supporting her. Some restoratives having been applied by Doctor Hodges, she had regained her sensibility, and was murmuring her thanks to her deliverer.

"She has not lost her beauty I perceive," cried Charles, gazing at her with admiration, and feeling something of his former passion revive within his breast.

"Your Majesty, I trust, will not mar their happiness," said Rochester, noticing the monarch's libertine look with uneasiness. "Remember, you owe your life to that young man."

"And I will pay the debt royally," replied Charles; "I will give him permission to marry her."

"Your Majesty's permission is scarcely needed," muttered Rochester.

"There you are wrong, my lord," replied the King. "She is now my ward, and I can dispose of her in marriage as I please; nor will I so dispose of her except to her equal in rank."

"I discern your Majesty's gracious intentions," replied Rochester, gratefully inclining his head.

"I almost forget my deliverer's name," whispered Charles, with a smile, "but it is of no consequence, since he will so speedily change it."

"His name is Leonard Holt," replied Rochester, in the same tone.

"Ah!—true," returned the King. "What ho! good Master Leonard Holt," he added, addressing the young man, "commit the Lady Isabella Argentine to the care of our worthy friend Doctor Hodges for a moment, and stand up before me." His injunctions being complied with, he continued, "The Lady Isabella Argentine and I owe our lives to you, and we must both evince our gratitude—she by devoting that life, which, if I am not misinformed, she will be right willing to do, to you, and I by putting you in a position to unite yourself to her. The title of Argentine has been this day extinguished by most unhappy circumstances, I, therefore, confer the title on you, and here, in this presence, create you Baron Argentine, of Argentine, in Staffordshire. Your patent shall be made out with all convenient despatch, and with it you shall receive the hand of the sole representative of that ancient and noble house."

"Your Majesty overwhelms me," replied Leonard, falling on his knee and pressing the King's hand, which was kindly extended towards him, to his lips. "I can scarcely persuade myself I am not in a dream."

"You will soon awaken to the sense of the joyful reality," returned the King. "Have I not now discharged my debt?" he added to Rochester.

"Right royally, indeed, my liege," replied the Earl, in a tone of unaffected emotion. "My lord," he added, grasping Leonard's hand, "I sincerely congratulate you on your newly-acquired dignities, nor less on the happiness that awaits you there."

"If I do not answer you fittingly, my lord," replied the new-made peer, "it is not because I do not feel your kindness. But my brain reels. Pray heaven my senses may not desert me."

"You must not forget the document you obtained this morning, my lord," replied Rochester, endeavouring to divert his thoughts into a new channel. "The proper moment for consulting it may have arrived."

Lord Argentine, for we shall henceforth give him his title, thrust his hand into his doublet and drew forth the parchment. He opened it and endeavoured to read it, but a mist swam before his eyes.

"Let me look at it," said Rochester, taking it from him. "It is a deed of gift," he said, after glancing at it for a moment, "from the late Lord Argentine—I mean the elder baron—of a large estate in Yorkshire, which he possessed in right of his wife, to you, my lord, here described as Leonard Holt, provided you shall marry the Lady Isabella Argentine. Another piece of good fortune. Again and again I congratulate you."

"And now," said Charles, "other and less pleasing matters claim our attention. Let the Lady Isabella be removed under the charge of Doctor Hodges to Whitehall, where apartments shall be provided for her at once, together with fitting attendants, and where she can remain till this terrible conflagration is over, which, I trust, soon will be, when I will no longer delay her happiness, but give her away in person. Chiffinch," he added to the chief page, "see all this carried into effect."

"I will, my liege, and right willingly," replied Chiffinch.

"I would send you with her, my lord," pursued Charles to Argentine, "but I have other duties for you to fulfil. The plan you proposed of demolishing the houses with gunpowder, shall be immediately put into operation under your own superintendence."

A chair was now brought, and the Lady Isabella, after a tender parting with her lover, being placed within it, she was thus transported, under the charge of Hodges and Chiffinch, to Whitehall, where she arrived in safety, though not without having sustained some hinderance and inconvenience.

She had not been gone many minutes when the conflagration of the cathedral assumed its most terrific character; the whole of the mighty roof falling in, and the flames soaring upwards as before related. Up to this time, Solomon Eagle had maintained his position at the eastern end of the roof, and still grasped the stone cross. His situation now attracted universal attention, and it was evident he must speedily perish.

"Poor wretch!" exclaimed the King, shuddering, "I fear there is no way of saving him."

"None whatever, my liege," replied Rochester, "nor do I believe he would consent to it if there was. But he is again menacing your Majesty."

As Rochester spoke, Solomon Eagle shook his arm menacingly at the royal party, raising it aloft, as if invoking the vengeance of Heaven. He then knelt down upon the sloping ridge of the roof, as if in prayer, and his figure, thus seen relieved against the mighty sheet of flame, might have been taken for an image of Saint John the Baptist, carved in stone. Not an eye in the vast crowd below but was fixed on him. In a few moments he rose again, and tossing his arms aloft, and shrieking in a voice distinctly heard above the awful roar around him, the single word, "Resurgam!" flung himself headlong into the flaming abyss. A si-multaneous cry of horror rose from the whole assemblage on beholding this desperate action.

"The last exclamation of the poor wretch may apply to the cathedral as well as to himself," replied the monarch to a middle-aged personage with a pleasing and highly-intellectual countenance, standing near him; "for the old building shall rise again, like the phoenix from its fires, with renewed beauty, and under your superintendence, Doctor Christopher Wren."

The great architect bowed.

"I cannot hope to erect such another structure," he said, modestly; "but I will endeavour to design an edifice that shall not disgrace your Majesty's city."

"You must build me another city at the same time, Doctor Wren," sighed the King. "Ah!" he added, "is not that Mr. Lilly, the almanac-maker, whom I see among the crowd?"

"It is," replied Rochester.

"Bid him come to me," replied the King. And the order being obeyed, he said to the astrologer, "Well, Mr. Lilly, your second prediction has come to pass. We have had the Plague, and now we have the Fire. You may thank my clemency that I do not order you to be cast into the flames, like the poor wretch who has just perished before our eyes, as a wizard and professor of the black art. How did you obtain information of these fatal events?"

"By a careful study of the heavenly bodies, sire," replied Lilly, "and by long and patient calculations, which, if your Majesty or any of your attendants had had leisure or inclination to make, would have afforded you the same information. I make no pretence to the gift of prophecy, but this calamity was predicted in the last century."

"Indeed! by whom?" asked the King.

"By Michael Nostradamus," replied Lilly. "His prediction runs thus:—

Le sang du juste à Londres fera faute, Bruslez par feu, le vingt et trois, les Six;

*La Dame antique cherra de place haute,
De même secte plusieurs seront occis.

And thus I venture to explain it. The 'blood of the just' refers to the impious and execrable murder of your Majesty's royal father of blessed memory. 'Three-and-twenty and six gives the exact year of the calamity; and it may likewise give us, as will be seen by computation hereafter, the amount of habitations to be destroyed. The 'Ancient Dame' undoubtedly refers to the venerable pile now burning before us, which, as it stands in the most eminent spot in the city, clearly 'falls from its high place.' The expression 'of the same sect,' refers not to men, but churches, of which a large number, I grieve to say it, are already destroyed."

"The prophecy is a singular one," remarked Charles, musingly, "and you have given it a plausible interpretation." And for some moments, he appeared lost in reflection. Suddenly rousing himself, he took forth his tablets, and hastily tracing a few lines upon a leaf, tore it out, and delivered it with his signet ring to Lord Argentine. "Take this, my lord," he said, "to Lord Craven. You will find him at his post in Tower-street. A band of my attendants shall go with you. Embark at the nearest stairs you can—those at Blackfriars I should conceive the most accessible. Bid the men row for their lives. As soon as you join Lord Craven, commence operations. The Tower must be preserved at all hazards. Mark me!—at all hazards."

"I understand your Majesty," replied Argentine—"your commands shall be implicitly obeyed. And if the conflagration has not gone too far, I will answer with my life that I preserve the fortress."

And he departed on his mission.

-
- * The blood of the just shall be wanting in London,
Burnt by fire of three-and-twenty, the Six;
The ancient Dame shall fall from her high place,
Of the same sect many shall be killed.

CHAPTER LVIII.

WHAT BEFEL CHOWLES AND JUDITH IN THE VAULTS OF SAINT FAITH.

HAVING now seen what occurred outside Saint Paul's, we shall proceed to the vaults beneath it. Chowles and Judith, it has been mentioned, were descried by Leonard, just before the outbreak of the fire, stealing into Saint Faith's, and carrying a heavy chest between them. This chest contained some of the altar-plate, which they had pillaged from the Convocation House. As they traversed the aisles of Saint Faith's, which were now filled with books and paper, they could distinctly hear the raging of the fire without, and Judith, who was far less intimidated than her companion, observed, "Let it roar on. It cannot injure us."

"I am not so sure of that," replied Chowles, doubtfully. "I wish we had taken our hoards elsewhere."

"There is no use in wishing that now," rejoined Judith. "And it would have been wholly impossible to get them out of the city. But have no fear. The fire, I tell you, cannot reach us. It could as soon burn into the solid earth as into this place."

"It comforts me to hear you say so," replied Chowles. "And when I think of those mighty stone floors above us, I feel we are quite safe. No, no, it can never make its way through them."

Thus discoursing, they reached the charnel at the further end of the church, where Chowles struck a light, and producing a flask of strong waters, took a copious draught himself and handed the flask to Judith, who imitated his example. Their courage being thus stimulated, they opened the chest, and Chowles was so enraptured with its glittering contents that he commenced capering round the vault. Recalled to quietude by a stern reproof from Judith, he opened a secret door in the wall, and pushed the chest into a narrow passage beyond it. Fearful of being discovered in their retreat, they took a basket of provisions and liquor with them, and then closed the door. For some time, they proceeded along the passage, pushing the chest before them, until they came to a descent of a few steps, which brought them to a large vault, half-filled with bags of gold, chests of plate, caskets, and other plunder. At the further end of this vault was a strong wooden door. Pushing the chest into the middle of the chamber, Chowles seated himself upon it, and opening the basket of provisions, took out the bottle of spirits, and again had recourse to it.

"How comfortable and secure we feel in this quiet place," he said, "while all above us is burning. I declare I feel quite merry, ha! ha!" And he forced a harsh and a discordant laugh.

"Give me the bottle," rejoined Judith, sternly, "and don't grin like a death's head. I don't like to see the frightful face you make."

"It's the first time you ever thought my face frightful," replied Chowles, "and I begin to think you are afraid."

"Afraid!" echoed Judith, forcing a derisive laugh in her turn; "afraid—of what!"

"Nay, I don't know," replied Chowles; "only I feel a little uncomfortable. What if we should not be able to breathe here? The very idea gives me a tightness across the chest."

"Silence!" cried Judith, with a fierceness that effectually ensured obedience to her command.

Chowles again had recourse to the bottle, and deriving a false courage from it, as before, commenced skipping about the chamber in his usual fantastical manner. Judith did not attempt to check him, but remained with her chin resting upon her hand, gazing at him.

"Do you remember the Dance of Death, Judith?" he cried, executing some of the wildest flourishes he had then performed, "and how I surprised the Earl of Rochester and his crew."

"I do," replied Judith, sternly, "and I hope we may not soon have to perform that dance together in reality."

"It was a merry night," rejoined Chowles, who did not hear what she said, "a right merry night—and so to-night shall be in spite of what is occurring overhead. Ha! ha!" and he took another long pull at the flask, "I breathe freely now." And he continued his wild flourishes until he was completely exhausted. He then sat down by Judith, and would have twined his bony arms round her neck, but she roughly repulsed him.

With a growl of displeasure, he then proceeded to open and examine the various bags, chests, and caskets piled upon the floor, and the sight of their contents so excited Judith, that, shaking off her misgivings, she joined him, and they continued opening case after case, glutting their greedy eyes, until Chowles became aware that the vault was filled with smoke. As soon as he perceived this, he started to his feet in terror.

"We are lost!—we shall be suffocated!" he cried.

Judith likewise arose, and her looks showed that she shared in his apprehensions.

"We must not stay here," cried Chowles; "and yet," he added, with an agonized look at the rich store before him, "the treasure! the treasure!"

"Ay, let us, at least, take something with us," rejoined Judith, snatching up two or three of the most valuable caskets.

While Chowles gazed at the heap before him, hesitating what to select, the smoke grew so dense around them, that Judith seized his arm and dragged him away.

"I come—I come!" he cried, snatching up a bag of gold.

They then threaded the narrow passage, Judith leading the way and bearing the light. The smoke grew thicker and thicker as they advanced, but regardless of this, they hurried to the secret door leading to the charnel. Judith touched the spring, but as she did so, a sheet of flame burst in and drove her back. Chowles dashed past her, and with great presence of mind, shut the door, excluding the flame. They then hastily retraced their steps, feeling that not a moment was to be lost if they would escape. The air in the vault, thickened by the smoke, had become so hot that they could scarcely breathe; added to which, to increase their terror, they heard the most awful cracking of the walls overhead, as if the whole fabric was breaking asunder to its foundation.

"The cathedral is tumbling upon us! We shall be buried alive!" exclaimed Chowles, as he listened with indescribable terror to the noise overhead.

"I owe my death to you, wretch!" cried Judith, fiercely. "You persuaded me to come hither."

"I!" cried Chowles. "It is a lie! You were the person who proposed it. But for you, I should have left our hoards here, and come for them after the fire was over."

"It is you who lie," returned Judith, with increased fury. "That was my proposal."

"Hold your tongue, you she-devil," cried Chowles. "It is you who have brought me into this strait—and if you do not cease taunting me, I will silence you for ever."

"Coward and fool!" cried Judith, "I will at least have the satisfaction of seeing you die before me."

And as she spoke, she rushed towards him, and a desperate struggle commenced. And thus, while the walls were cracking overhead, threatening them with instant destruction, the two wretches continued their strife, uttering the most horrible blasphemies and execrations. Judith, being the stronger of the two, had the advantage, and she had seized her opponent by the throat with the intention of strangling him, when a most terrific crash was heard, causing her to loose her gripe. The air instantly became as hot as the breath of a furnace, and both started to their feet.

"What has happened?" gasped Chowles.

"I know not," replied Judith, "and I dare not look down the passage."

"Then I will," replied Chowles, as he advanced a few paces up it, and then hastily returned, shrieking, "it is filled with boiling lead, and the stream is flowing towards us."

Scarcely able to credit the extent of the danger, Judith gazed down the passage, and there beheld a glowing silvery stream trickling slowly onwards. She saw too well, that if they could not effect their retreat instantly, their fate was sealed.

"The door of the vault!" she cried, pointing towards it. "Where is the key? where is the key?"

"I have not got it," replied Chowles, distractedly, "I cannot tell where to find it."

"Then we are lost," cried Judith, with a terrible exclamation.

"Not so," replied Chowles, snatching up a pick-axe, "if I cannot unlock the door, I can break it open."

With this, he commenced furiously striking against it, while Judith, who was completely horror-stricken, and filled with the conviction that her last moments were at hand, fell on her knees beside him, and gazing down the passage, along which she could see the stream of molten lead, now nearly a foot in depth, gradually advancing, and hissing as it came, shrieked to Chowles to increase his exertions. He needed no incitement to do so, but nerved by fear, continued to deal blow after blow against the door, until at last he effected a small breach just above the lock. But this only showed him how vain were his hopes, for a stream of fire and smoke poured through the aperture. Notwithstanding this, he continued his exertions, Judith shrieking all the time, until the lock at last yielded. He then threw open the door, but finding the whole passage involved in flame, was obliged to close it, Judith had now risen, and their looks at each other at this fearful moment were terrible in the extreme. Retreating to either side of the cell, they glared at each other like wild beasts. Suddenly, Judith casting her eyes to the entrance of the vault, uttered a yell of terror that caused her companion to look in that direction, and he perceived that the stream of molten lead had gained it, and was descending the steps. He made a rush towards the door at the same time with Judith, and another struggle ensued, in which he succeeded in dashing her upon the floor. He again opened the door, but was again driven backwards by the terrific flame, and perceived that the fiery current had reached Judith, who was writhing and shrieking in its embrace. Before Chowles could again stir it was upon him. With a yell of anguish, he fell forward, and was instantly stifled in the glowing torrent, which in a short time flooded the whole chamber, burying the two partners in iniquity, and the whole of their ill-gotten gains, in its burning waves.

CHAPTER LIX.

CONCLUSION.

LORD ARGENTINE proceeded, as directed by the King, to the eastern end of Tower-street, where he found Lord Craven, and having delivered him the King's missive, and shown him the signet, they proceeded to the western side of the Tower-dock, and having procured a sufficient number of miners and engineers, together with a supply of powder from the fortress, commenced undermining the whole of the row of habitations called Tower Bank, on the edge of the dock, having first, it is scarcely necessary to state, taken care to clear them of their inhabitants. The powder deposited, the trains were fired, and the buildings blown into the air. At this time, the whole of the western side of the Tower moat was covered with low wooden houses and sheds, and mindful of the King's instructions Lord Argentine suggested to Lord Craven that they should be destroyed. The latter acquiescing, they proceeded to their task, and in a short time, the whole of the buildings of whatever description, from the bulwark-gate to the city postern, at the north of the Tower, and nearly opposite the Bowyer-tower, were destroyed. Long before this was accomplished they were joined by the Duke of York, who lent his utmost assistance to the task, and when night came on, a clear space of at least a hundred yards in depth had been formed between the ancient fortress and the danger with which it was threatened.

Meantime, the conflagration continued to rage with unabated fury. It burnt throughout the whole of Monday night, and having destroyed Saint Paul's, as before related, poured down Ludgate-hill, consuming all in its way, and crossing Fleet-bridge, commenced its ravages upon the great thoroughfare adjoining it.

On Tuesday, an immense tract was on fire. All Fleet-street, as far as the Inner Temple, Ludgate-hill, and the whole of the city eastwards, along the banks of the Thames, up to the Tower-dock, where the devastation was checked by the vast gap of houses demolished, were in flames. From thence the boundary of the fire extended to the end of Mark-lane, Lime-street, and Leadenhall, the strong walls of which resisted its fury. Ascending again by the standard on Cornhill, Threadneedle-street, and Austin-friars, it embrace Draper's Hall, and the whole mass of buildings to the west of Throgmorton-street. It next proceeded to the then new buildings behind Saint Margaret's, Lothbury, and so on westward to the upper end of Cateaton-street, whence it spread to the second postern in London Wall, and destroying the ramparts and suburbs as far as Cripplegate, consumed Little Wood-street, Mungwell-street, and the whole of the city wall on the west as far as Aldersgate. Passing a little to the north of Saint Sepulchre's, which it destroyed, it crossed Holborn-bridge, and ascending Saint Andrew's-hill, passed the end of Shoe-lane, and so on to the end of Fetter-lane. The whole of the buildings contained within this boundary were now on fire, and burning with terrific fury. And so they continued till the middle of Wednesday, when the wind abating, and an immense quantity of houses being demolished, according to Lord Argentine's plan, the conflagration was got under; and though it broke out in several places after that time, little mischief was done, and it may be said to have ceased on the middle of that day.

On Saturday morning in that week, soon after day-break, a young man, plainly yet richly attired in the habiliments then worn by persons of high rank, took his way over the smouldering heaps of rubbish, and along the ranks of ruined and blackened walls denoting the habitations that had once constituted Fleet-street. It was with no little risk, and some difficulty, that he could force his way—now clambering over heaps of smouldering ashes, now passing by some toppling wall, which fell with a terrific crash after he had just passed it—now creeping under an immense pile of blackened rafters; but he at length reached Fleet-bridge, where he paused to gaze at the scene of devastation around him. It was, indeed, a melancholy sight, and drew tears to his eyes. The ravages of the fire were almost inconceivable. Great beams were burnt to charcoal—stones calcined, and as white as snow, and such walls and towers as were left standing were so damaged that their instant fall was to be expected. The very water in the wells and fountains was boiling, and even the muddy Fleet sent forth a hot steam. The fire still lingered in the lower parts of many habitations, especially where wine, spirits, or inflammable goods had been kept; and these "vorages of subterranean cellars," as Evelyn terms them, still emitted flames, together with a prodigious smoke and stench. Undismayed by the dangers of the path he had to traverse, the young man ascended Ludgate-hill, still encountering the same devastation, and passing through the ruined gateway, the end of which remained perfect, approached what had once been St. Paul's Cathedral. Mounting a heap of rubbish at the end of Ludgate-street, he gazed at the mighty ruin, which looked more like the remains of a city than those of a single edifice.

The solid walls and buttresses were split and rent asunder; enormous stones were splintered and calcined by the heat; and vast flakes having scaled from off the pillars, gave them a hoary and almost ghostly appearance. Its enormous extent was now for the first time clearly seen, and strange to say, it looked twice as large in ruins as when entire. The central tower was still standing—but chipped, broken, and calcined like the rest of the structure, by the vehement heat of the flames. Part of the roof in its fall broke through the solid floor of the choir, which was of immense thickness, into Saint Faith's, and destroyed the magazine of books and paper deposited there by the booksellers. The portico, erected by Inigo Jones, and which found so much favour in Evelyn's eyes, that he describes it as "comparable to any in Europe," and particularly deplores its loss, shared the fate of the rest of the building,—the only part left uninjured being the architrave the inscription on which was undefaced.

Having satiated himself with this sad but striking prospect, the young man, with some toil and trouble, crossed the churchyard and gained Cheapside, where a yet more terrific scene of devastation than that which he had previously witnessed burst upon him. On the right to London Bridge, which he could discern through the chasms of the houses, and almost to the Tower, were nothing but ruins, while a similar waste lay on the left. Such was the terrible change that had been wrought in the aspect of the ruined city, that if the young man had not had some marks to guide him, he would not have known where he was. The tower and ruined walls of Saint Peter's church pointed out to him the entrance to Wood-street, and entering it, he traversed it with considerable difficulty,—for the narrow thoroughfares were much fuller of rubbish, and much less freed from smoke and fiery vapour, than the wider,—until he reached a part of it with which he had once been well acquainted. But, alas! how changed was that familiar spot. The house he sought was a mere heap of ruins. While gazing at them, he heard a voice behind him, and turning, beheld Mr. Bloundel and his son Stephen, forcing their way through what had once been Maiden-lane. A warm greeting passed between them, and Mr. Bloundel gazed for some time in silence upon the wreck of his dwelling. Tears forced themselves into his eyes, and his companions were no less moved. As he turned to depart, he observed to the young man with some severity, "How is it, Leonard, that I see you in this gay apparel? Surely, the present is not a fitting season for such idle display?"

Lord Argentine, for such it was, now explained to the wonder-stricken grocer all that had occurred to him, adding that he had intended coming to him that very day, if he had not been thus anticipated, to give him the present explanation.

"And where are Farmer Wingfield and Blaize?" asked Mr. Bloundel. "We have been extremely uneasy at your prolonged absence."

"They are both at the palace," replied Lord Argentine, "and have both been laid up with slight injuries received during the conflagration, but I believe—nay I am sure, they will get out to day."

"That is well," replied Mr. Bloundel—"and now let me congratulate you, Leonard—that is my lord—how strange such a title sounds!—on your new dignity."

"And accept my congratulations, too, my lord," said Stephen.

"Oh! do not style me thus," said Argentine. "With you at least, let me be ever Leonard Holt."

"You are still my old apprentice, I see," cried the grocer, warmly grasping his hand.

"And such I shall ever continue in feeling," returned the other, cordially returning the pressure.

Three days after this, Lord Argentine was united to the Lady Isabella—the King, as he had promised, giving away the bride. The Earl of Rochester was present, together with the grocer and his wife, and the whole of their family. Another marriage also took place on the same day between Blaize and Patience. Both unions, it is satisfactory to be able to state, were extremely happy, though it would be uncandid not to mention, that in the latter case, to use a homely but expressive phrase, "the grey mare proved the better horse." Blaize, however, was exceedingly content under his government. He settled at Willesden with his wife, where they lived to a good old age, and where some of his descendants may still be found.

Mr. Bloundel sustained only a trifling loss by the fire. Another house was erected on the site of the old habitation, where he carried on his business as respectably and as profitably as before, until, in the course of nature, he was gathered to his fathers, and succeeded by his son Stephen, leaving an unblemished character behind him as a legacy to his family. Nor was it his only legacy, in a worldly sense, for his time had not been mis-spent, and he had well husbanded his money. All his family turned out well, and were successful in the world. Stephen rose to the highest civic dignities, and the younger obtained great distinction. Their daughter Christiana became Lady Argentine, being wedded to the eldest son of the Baron and Baroness.

Mike Macasree, the piper, and Bell, found a happy asylum with the same noble family.

As to Lord and Lady Argentine, theirs was a life of uninterrupted happiness. Devotedly attached to her lord, the Lady Isabella seemed only to live for him, and he well repaid her affection. By sedulously cul-

i va ting his talents and powers, which were considerable, he was enabled to reflect credit upon the high rank to which it had pleased a grateful sovereign to elevate him. He lived to see the new cathedral completed by Sir Christopher Wren, and often visited it with feelings of admiration, but never with the same sentiments of veneration and awe that he had experienced, when, in times long gone by, he had repaired to OLD SAINT PAUL'S.

THE END.

